Red River, the southernmost of the great tributaries of the Mississippi, rises in the Staked Plain of northwestern Texas, flows generally eastward to Fulton, Ark. (forming in this course the S. boundary of Oklahoma and Indian Territory), thence S. to Shreveport, La., and from this point SE. to the Mississippi, which it enters in about lat. 31° N. Its length is estimated at about 1200 miles; drainage-basin, about 90,000 sq. m. A partial discharge of the river is effected directly into the Gulf of Mexico through the Atchafalaya Bayou, and during periods of very low-water the stream may be entirely cut off from the Mississippi. The chief affluents are the North Fork, Washita (of Indian Territory), Little River, Washita (Ouachita), Peace, and Big Wichita. Steamboats of light draft can ascend the river to Shreveport, about 350 miles from its mouth, during 7 months of the year, and in high water several hundred miles farther.

Red River of the North, a river of the United States and Canada, rises in two branches—one having its source in Lake Traverse, on the borders of Minnesota and South Dakota, and the other in a small lake in western Minnesota—which unite at Breckenridge, the stream thence flowing generally northward and forming the boundary between Minnesota and North Dakota. This northerly course is continued into Manitoba, where (at Winnipeg) the river receives the Assiniboin, and the combined stream then flows to the S. end of Lake Winnipeg. Throughout the major part of its course the river flows through a flat plain, with an average width of 30–35 miles, which is noted for its fertility. The greater part of this plain lies within the region that was formerly occupied by a vast lake, to which geologists have given the name of Lake Agassiz, and of which some of the remaining traces are recognized in the lakes of Manitoba. The chief tributaries are the Red Lake, Buffalo, Marsh, Roseau, Cheyenne, and Pembina rivers. The Red River is navigable for steamboats to Fargo. Total length, about 700 miles.

Red Sea, or Arabian Gulf (L. Erythræum Mare or Mare Rubrum), an extensive inland sea, communicating with the Indian Ocean (Gulf of Aden) by the Strait of Bab-el-Mandeb, and stretching in a NNW. direction between Arabia on the E. and the Egyptian dominions and Eritrea on the W., and separated from the Mediterranean on the N. only by the Isthmus of Suez, which, where narrowest, does not exceed 72 miles across. The name Red Sea seems to bear no relation either to the masses of red Fuci (Trichodermum erythræum) that are a part of the flora of the basin or to the color of the water itself, which is blue (appearing green on the coral reefs). The sea forms a very long and comparatively narrow expanse, about 1450 miles in length. The greatest breadth does not exceed 200 miles. At the N. extremity it divides into two branches, one of which, the Gulf of Akabah, penetrates N. by E. into Arabia for about 100 miles, with an average breadth of about 12 miles; while the other, the Gulf of Suez, follows the general direction of the sea and penetrates between Arabia and Egypt about 200 miles, with an average breadth of 20 miles. From this point, through the ship-canal of Suez, its waters communicate with the Mediterranean. In the fork between these two branches is Mount Sinai. The shores, both on the E. and W., are for the most part sandy, though sometimes swampy, from 10 to 30 miles in width, and suddenly terminated by the abutments of table-lands from 3000 to 6000 feet high. The Red Sea is generally considered to occupy the bottom of an immense longitudinal valley, or subsided trough of the earth's crust ("rift valley"), which at one time may have extended quite to the table-lands on either side. This valley would seem to have since been partially filled up by coral growths, which, extending in parallel lines at a short distance from either coast, have subdivided the sea into three different channels and have also studded its shores with numerous small islands. Geologists have assumed a distinct relation to exist between the trough of the Red Sea and the subsided rifts which define the positions of the great lakes of eastern Africa. One of its markedly distinctive features is the presence within it of active volcanoes. The depth of the Red Sea is very considerable, averaging, it is thought, not less than 1400–1500 ft. Opposite Jidda a ridge or upraised bank, over which the water does not exceed 500 fathoms, divides the basin into a northern and a southern half, soundings in which have given respectively 1200 and 1190 fathoms (7200 and 7140 ft.). The Gulf of Akabah has a depth of nearly 4000 ft., but the Gulf of Suez is shallow and; perhaps, nowhere attains 200 ft. The evaporation from the surface is very great, 80–90 inches annually, and the salinity considerably higher than that of the free oceans. The currents of the sea are almost entirely the result of its prevailing winds. From October to May, when the wind blows generally with great constancy from the S., a strong current sets in from the Strait of Bab-el-Mandeb and produces a general rise in the water of about 2 ft.; from May to October the N. wind continues to blow with such force and constancy as to give the current a S. direction. Navigation by sailing vessel is thus made almost seasonal. The temperature of the surface waters is high, rising in May and June to 90°; the deepest waters have at no times a temperature of less than 70°. The animal life of the Red Sea is extraordinarily rich, especially on or about the coral reefs. The principal harbors of the Red Sea are, on the African coast, Suez, Kosseir, Suakin, and Massowa, and on the Arabian coast, Jidda, Yembo (Yanbo), Loheia, Hodeida, and Mocha. The Red Sea has become a most important channel of commerce in connection with the Suez Canal. See SUEZ.

The Jews and Phœnicians appear to have carried on an extensive trade upon this sea, and after the destruction of the Persian Empire it resumed its importance as the principal route of traffic between Europe and the East, which position it retained until the discovery of the passage round the Cape of Good Hope and which it has recently regained. The trade from shore to shore at present is not of much importance.

Réunion, formerly Bourbon (Fr. Île de la Réunion, el dẹh lā rā'ü'ne-ôn[ng]′), an island of the Mascarene group, Indian Ocean, forming a French colony. Lat. 21° S.; lon. 55° 30′ E. Area, 790 sq. m. Pop. in 1902, 173,315, of whom upward of 13,000 were East Indians, 9500 negroes, and 1380 Chinese. The island is of volcanic origin and is traversed from N. to S. by a chain of mountains which divides it into two portions, an eastern, partie du vent (windward), and a western, partie sous le vent (leeward). Much of the interior is a plateau, rising to 5000 feet and more, which is dominated by numerous lofty volcanoes, nearly all of which are extinct. The chief summits are the Piton des Neiges (10,070 ft. high), Grand-Bénard (9500 ft.), Pic de Chicots, Gros Morne, and Piton de la Fournaise, an active volcano (3500 ft.) whose eruptions (extending down to 1897) have been marked by large lava-flows. There are no extensive plains, but the mountains are separated by narrow valleys. The island is watered by numerous streams, all of which are rapid and none navigable. The climate is fairly salubrious; upland sanatoria have been established at Salazie and Hellbourg. The mean annual temperature is about 78°. The annual rainfall is in places 150 inches. Capital, Saint-Denis. Réunion has no natural port and its anchorages are insecure. Pointe-des-Galets is connected by rail with Saint-Benoît and Saint-Pierre. The soil is fertile near the coast. The chief products are sugar, coffee, cloves, corn, tapioca, vanilla, and tobacco. The native forest, now in greater part removed, was noted for its wonderful exuberance and wealth of distinctive types. Of the indigenous fauna the most remarkable types were represented by a number of giant rallinæ and other birds (now extinct) and by the (also extinct) dodo. The island is administered by a governor and it is represented in the French parliament by 1 senator and 2 deputies. It was discovered in the early part of the sixteenth century by the Portuguese navigator Mascarenhas, after whom the island group was named.

Rheydt, or Rheidt, rīte, a town of Rhenish Prussia, 25 miles NW. of Cologne and 2½ miles S. of Gladbach, on the Niers. It is a busy seat of the textile industry. Pop. in 1900 (including some neighboring places), 34,036.

Rhine (Ger. Rhein, rīne; Dutch, Rijn or Rhyn, rīne; Fr. Rhin, rȧNe; anc. Rhenus), the most important commercial river of the continent of Europe and the largest river of Germany, is formed in Switzerland by the union of two small streams, the Hinter Rhein and the Vorder Rhein, the former of which has its source in the Paradies (or Rheinwald) Glacier, near the NW. base of the San Bernardino Pass, at an elevation of 7270 feet, while the latter issues from Lake Toma, near the N. foot of the St. Gotthard mountain, at an altitude of 7690 ft. The two arms unite at Reichenau, in the canton of Grisons, whence the course of the steam is directed generally northward to Lake Constance, which it enters near its SE. extremity a short distance from Rheineck. In this portion of its course the river forms part of the boundary between Switzerland and Austria (Vorarlberg). Passing out from the NW. extremity of the lake the river soon expands into the Untersee, whence it flows generally westward to Basel, forming the southern boundary of Baden. At the imposing falls of Schaffhausen (or Falls of the Rhine), where the stream in majestic leaps descends nearly 100 ft., a level of 1180 ft. above the sea has been reached. Beyond Basel the river maintains a generally northerly direction through more than four degrees of latitude, being confined entirely within German territory and passing, among the more notable towns, Strassburg, Speyer, Mannheim, Ludwigshafen, Worms, Mainz, Bingen, Coblenz, Bonn, Cologne, Düsseldorf, and Wesel. The section or flow between Basel (where regular steam navigation begins) and Bingen is ordinarily designated the Upper Rhine, that between Bingen and Cologne, Middle Rhine, and that between Cologne and the sea, or the ramified arms of the main stream, the Lower Rhine. The Rhine enters the territory of the Netherlands a short distance below Emmerich, taking a westerly direction south of lat. 52° N., and almost immediately subdivides into two main and nearly parallel arms. The more southerly of these is known successively as the Waal (to Loevenstein), Merwede (to Dordrecht), Noord (to Krimpen), and the Nieuwe Maas, the last-named passing Rotterdam and discharging into the North Sea at the Hook of Holland. A southern branch of this arm, below Dordrecht, is known as the Oude Maas. The stream from the Merwede to the sea is by some geographers considered to be the Meuse (Maas). The northern arm divides after a course of about 7 miles, one branch being continued almost (direct) N. to the Zuider Zee as the Yssel, and the other, known over most of its course as the Lek, westward to its discharge into the Noord at Krimpen. From the latter branch a somewhat tortuous stream is given off at Wijk, which as the Kromme Rijn (Crooked Rhine) passes Utrecht and as the Oude Rijn (Old Rhine) passes Leyden, and discharges into the North Sea at Katwijk.

The total length of the Rhine from Reichenau to the North Sea, including its windings, is about 700 miles, of which 400 miles are in German territory. The width of the stream is, at or near Assmannshausen, 820 feet; near Bonn, 1250–1500 ft.; at Cologne, 1300–1700 ft.; and at Emmerich, 3270 ft. The normal depth of the stream in its middle and upper courses varies from 5 to 15 ft., the greater depth occasionally reaching from 25 to 70 ft. At the rocks of the Lorelei (430 ft. high), a short distance above Sankt Goar, the river contracts to 660 ft. and attains its maximum depth of 76 ft. Among the more important tributaries of the Rhine are the Thur and Aar, in Switzerland; the Ill, Neckar, Main, Lahn, Moselle, Ruhr, and Lippe, in Germany. In the Netherlands it unites with the Maas, and their interassociated waters form a large part of the delta-system to which the Scheldt is a large contributor in the S. The importance of the Rhine navigation has been vastly increased by the numerous canals which establish communication with the heart of France and other parts. The most far-reaching communication of this kind is that afforded by the Ludwig's Canal, which unites the waters of the Rhine with those of the Danube.

The Rhine ranks as the most picturesque stream of Europe, its well-cared-for river-front, its verdant slopes receding as vine-clad hills or forested and craggy mountains, its quaint towns, villages, and villa-sites, and the imposing ruins of ancient castles giving to its scenery a quality which is unknown in the case of any other river of the globe. Among the most famous of the Rhine ruins are the castles of Rheinfels, Reichenberg, Schönburg, Stahleck, Fürstenberg, and Rheinstein. Much of the region traversed by the Rhine, chiefly between Mainz and Bonn, is famous for its wines, the quality of the white wine produced being unsurpassed in the world.

Rhine, a post-town of Dodge co., Ga., on the Seaboard Air Line. The banking point is Eastman. Pop. in 1900, 191.

Rhine, a post-village in Rhine township (town), Sheboygan co., Wis., on the Sheboygan River, about 21 miles SW. of Manitowoc. Pop. of the town in 1900, 1285.

Rhinebeck, a banking post-village in Rhinebeck township (town), Dutchess co., N.Y., 2 miles E. of the Hudson River and 16 miles N. of Poughkeepsie, on the Central New England R. Pop. in 1900, 1494; of the town, 3472. Rhinecliff station on the New York Central and Hudson River R., 2 miles to the W., was formerly known as Rhinebeck.

Rhinecliff, a post-village of Dutchess co., N.Y., on the E. bank of the Hudson River, 15 miles above Poughkeepsie, on the New York Central and Hudson River and the Central New England Rs. Steam ferries connect it with Rondout and Kingston. Pop. about 500.

Rhine, Confederation of the, a league of German princes formed under the protection of Napoleon in 1806. It included the rulers of Bavaria, Württemberg, Baden, Hesse-Darmstadt, Nassau, and Berg, and a number of other princes, among them the arch-chancellor Dalberg, who was made prince-primate of the confederacy. Its formation brought about the dissolution of the German Empire. After this other princes joined. In 1813 the confederacy ceased to exist.

Rhineland, a banking post-town of Montgomery co., Mo., on the Missouri, Kansas and Texas R., 18 miles S. of Danville. Pop. in 1900, 153.

Rhineland, a post-village of Knox co., Tex. Pop. 65.

Rhinelander, a banking city, capital of Oneida co., Wis., on the Chicago and Northwestern and the Minneapolis, St. Paul and Sault Ste. Marie Rs., 65 miles NNE. of Wausau. It has manufactures of refrigerators, paper, beer, and lumber. Pop. in 1900, 4998.

Rhine Province (Rhenish Prussia), the westernmost province of Prussia, bordering on the Netherlands, Belgium, and Luxemburg on the W., and traversed from SE. to NW. by the Rhine, which here receives the Moselle from the left and the Sieg, Ruhr, and Lippe from the right. Area, 10,423 sq. m. The N. part of the region is lowland, the rest mountainous or hilly. The province has immense deposits of coal, the principal fields being in the region of the Ruhr in the N. and in that of the Saar (an affluent of the Moselle) in the S. It is extremely rich in metals, which include iron, lead, zinc, manganese, etc. The Rhine Province is the great seat of the iron and steel manufacture of Prussia, and the textile industry is on a vast scale. The vineyards of the Rhine and Moselle are noted for their products. Among the manufacturing centres are Elberfeld-Barmen, Essen, Cologne, Aix-la-Chapelle, Düsseldorf, Krefeld, Remscheid, Solingen, Gladbach, Duisburg, Burtscheid, and Lennep. The province is divided into the administrative districts of Cologne, Düsseldorf, Aix-la-Chapelle, Coblenz, and Treves. Capital, Coblenz. The university-town of Bonn is in this province. Pop. in 1900, 5,759,798. This is the most populous province of Prussia and contains the largest number of inhabitants to the square mile.

Rhinns (rĭnz) or Rinns of Galloway (anc. Chersone'sus Novan'tum), a peninsula of the SW. coast of Scotland, co. of Wigtown, cut off from the rest of the county by Loch Ryan and Luce Bay. It terminates in the S. in the Mull of Galloway.

Rhò, a town of Italy, 8 miles WNW. of Milan. Pop. (commune) in 1901, 6054.

Rhoades, a post-village of Coconino co., Ariz. Pop. 65.

Rhoda, ro'dȧ, or Roda, an island of Egypt, in the Nile, opposite Cairo, 2 miles in length. It contains the Khedive's gardens and the famous ancient Nilometer.

Rhodanus, the ancient name of the Rhone.

Rhode Island, one of the New England States and one of the original thirteen members of the American Union, bounded on the N. and E. by Massachusetts, S. by the Atlantic Ocean, and W. by Connecticut. Its coast-line is deeply indented by Narragansett Bay, which receives the Taunton and Providence estuaries. Within the bay lie Aquidneck or Rhode Island (which gives name to the state), Canonicut, Prudence, Patience, Hope, Perry, Dutch, and other islands, and off the coast lies Block Island, which constitutes the town of New Shoreham. Area of the land-surface, 1053 sq. m.; of the appertaining waters, 197 sq. m. Rhode Island is thus the smallest state of the national domain.

Face of the Country.—The country is very generally rough, hilly, and stony, especially in the NW.; but towards the sea-shore there are some level pine plains and cedar swamps. There are no mountains in the state. Durfee Hill, in the NW., and Jerimoth Hill, rising respectively to 805 and 795 feet, are the loftiest elevations of the state. The island of Aquidneck is for the most part very fertile and has been called "the Eden of America." Block Island is also very productive.

Rivers, etc.—The so-called Providence River is an arm of Narragansett Bay and is also an estuary for the waters of the Blackstone, Pawtucket, or Seekonk River, which is navigable to Pawtucket. Large vessels ascend the estuary to Providence, where the Woonasquatucket and Mooshassuck discharge their waters. Mount Hope Bay is the eastern arm of Narragansett Bay and the estuary of the Taunton River. The Pawtuxet (a tributary of the Providence estuary), Pawcatuck (which forms part of the SW. boundary with Connecticut), Wood, and nearly all the other rivers afford water-power which is extensively utilized.

Geology, Minerals, etc.—A great part of the state is underlaid by Laurentian or Eozoic rocks, but the island of Aquidneck and a strip reaching northward and northeastward far into Massachusetts are of Carboniferous age, and in the extreme N. there is a small area referred to the Devonian. The surface is generally deeply buried in drift. There are some local developments of coal, which is a very hard and much metamorphosed anthracite or semi-graphite and difficult to burn. It was formerly mined at Portsmouth, Cumberland, and Valley Falls. At Westerly there are extensive granite-quarries and at Limerock lime is quarried and burned. Iron-ores have been found at several points, and some ores of copper, with small amounts of native copper. Amorphous graphite is supplied by Providence co. The granite quarried in 1903 was valued at $710,291.

The climate is milder and more agreeable than in the other New England states, with a mean temperature for January of 36° and for July of 75°–76°. The annual rainfall varies from 40 to 50 inches.

Agriculture.—The soil of Aquidneck Island is mostly excellent and its butter is in high repute. Before the Revolution the island had a famous breed of pacing horses which were largely exported to the West Indies. The large number of manufacturing towns has rendered market gardening, dairying, and milk-farming profitable employments. Most of the soil is better adapted for grazing than for tillage. The chief agricultural crops in 1900 were: corn, 262,304 bushels; oats, 114,484 bushels; barley, 8736 bushels; potatoes, 698,232 bushels; and hay, 66,496 tons.

Maritime Pursuits.—Providence had once a great West India and China trade and Newport was in colonial times a seat of the African slave-trade. But since many years the foreign commerce of the state has been comparatively unimportant. Providence receives great amounts of coal and cotton for the neighboring states, as well as for the home supply, and is an important outlet for the manufactured goods of New England. The fisheries employ a large number of vessels of light tonnage, chiefly in taking fresh fish (cod, haddock, blue-fish, etc.) for the New York market. The scup (or porgy) is largely taken in Narragansett Bay, as well as the shad and alewife (or river-herring). Menhaden are extensively caught for making oil and fish guano. The clams of Narragansett Bay are renowned, and in the Providence River oyster-planting is an important pursuit. The dried codfish of Block Island is in high repute.

Manufactures constitute by far the leading industrial pursuits of Rhode Island. The textile industry holds the first position, the product in this field in 1900 having been valued at $78,133,258. Rhode Island ranks high among the wool-manufacturing states and in the manufactures of cotton it is surpassed only by Massachusetts. The greater part of the manufacturing industries are concentrated in Providence, Pawtucket, and Bristol. In 1900 the values of the products of the leading industries were: jewelry, $13,320,620; foundry and machine-shop products, $13,269,086; cotton goods, $26,435,675; worsteds, $33,341,329; woollens, $5,330,550; textile dyeing, etc., $8,484,878; silver-ware, $3,834,408; rubber and elastic goods, $2,518,268; silk, $1,311,333.

Railroads.—In 1850 the railroads measured 68 miles; in 1860, 108 miles; in 1870, 136 miles; in 1880, 210 miles; in 1890, 224 miles; in 1900 (a decrease), 209 miles.

The counties are Bristol, Kent, Newport, Providence, and Washington.

The principal cities and towns are Providence, the state capital (pop. in 1900, 175,597), Pawtucket (39,231), Woonsocket (28,204), Newport (22,034), and Central Falls (18,167). Newport is the most fashionable of American sea-side resorts. Narragansett Pier is also a noted watering-place.

Government, etc.—Down to 1842 the state government was based upon the colonial charter of 1663 which was granted by Charles II., but in that year the present state constitution was adopted. The governor is chosen annually. The general assembly consists of a senate and house of representatives elected annually. The state sends 2 members to the lower house of Congress.

Education.—The leading institution of learning in the state is Brown University, at Providence, which is one of the oldest colleges in the country. A state agricultural and mechanical college is maintained at Kingston and a state normal school at Providence.

Population.—In 1730 the population was 17,935; in 1770, 59,678; in 1790, 68,825; in 1800, 69,122; in 1810, 76,931; in 1820, 83,059; in 1830, 97,199; in 1840, 108,830; in 1850, 147,545; in 1860, 174,620; in 1870, 217,353; in 1880, 276,531; in 1890, 345,506; in 1900, 428,556.

History.—Rhode Island was colonized by Roger Williams, who settled at Providence Plantations in 1636, and by William Coddington and others, who settled at Portsmouth, on Aquidneck Island (Rhode Island), in 1638. In 1639 Newport was founded and in 1642 a settlement was established by Samuel Gorton at Warwick. In 1644 Roger Williams obtained a patent for the united government of the settlements, which, however, he was unable to establish before 1647. The royal charter for the Rhode Island and Providence Plantations was issued in 1663. The government of Rhode Island was remarkable in that it permitted complete freedom in religious matters. The early settlers were mainly refugees from the ecclesiastical tyranny which prevailed in Massachusetts. Newport early became a commercial town of great wealth and refinement. In 1776 Rhode Island emancipated itself from British rule. The state did not ratify the federal constitution until 1790, it being the last of the original states to accede to it. In 1790 the first successful cotton-mill in the country was established at Pawtucket by Samuel Slater. In 1842 the Dorr rebellion took place, a revolt against the state of things perpetuated by the charter of 1663, which had served in place of a constitution and under which the power lay in the country towns, while at the same time suffrage was restricted. As a result a new state constitution was adopted.

Rhodelia, a post-village of Meade co., Ky. Pop. 65.

Rhoden, ro'den, a town of Germany, in Waldeck, 24 miles WNW. of Cassel. Pop. about 1500.

Rhodes, rōdz (L. Rho'dus; Gr. 'Ρόδος, Rhŏdŏs), an island of Turkey, in the Mediterranean Sea, off the SW. coast of Asia Minor, between lat. 35° 53′ and 36° 28′ N. and lon. 27° 40′ and 28° 15′ E. Area, about 550 sq. m. Pop. estimated at 30,000–35,000, of whom about 8000 are Turks, 2500 Jews, and the remainder Greeks, with a few Franks. The island is traversed by a number of mountain-ridges, which attain an extreme elevation somewhat exceeding 4000 feet, and have long supplied good timber for shipbuilding. The valleys are well watered and highly fertile. The principal exports are wax, honey, figs, coral, sponges, oranges, lemons, pomegranates, wine, valonia, onions, and manufactured silk. The grape is of a particularly fine quality. The island is frequently visited by earthquakes. It is the seat of a Turkish pasha and of a Greek bishop. Capital, Rhodes.

Rhodes, a seaport of Asiatic Turkey, capital of the island of Rhodes, at its NE. extremity, 13 miles SE. of the nearest promontory of Asia Minor. Lat. 36° 26′ N.; lon. 28° 13′ E. The town has two harbors, one of which is choked with sand. It presents a picturesque and imposing appearance, rising amphitheatrically from the shore and surrounded by its old walls, now dilapidated, constructed by the Knights of St. John, above which rise the domes and minarets of its many mosques, once Christian churches. Within the town is mean, but interesting in its memorials of the time when it was one of the bulwarks of Christendom against the Turks. The Street of the Knights is impressive with its massive old structures, still bearing the mediæval coats of arms. The Grand Hospital of the Knights is now used for barracks. The palace of the Grand Master and the Church of St. John were shattered by the explosion of the powder-magazine in 1856 and their destruction was completed by an earthquake. The general aspect of the place is that of a decaying city, but the outskirts are attractive with their country houses and gardens. The population is about 10,000 and is composed of Turks, Greeks, and Jews, the Christians inhabiting the suburbs. Many coasting vessels touch here, but the volume of the trade is not very large. The town is the seat of a Greek archbishop. In antiquity it was one of the most celebrated of Greek cities, and it occupies a leading position in the history of Greek arts, especially sculpture. It boasted of the famous brazen Colossus (representing Helios, the sun-god of the Rhodians), one of the seven wonders of the world, which stood at the entrance of its harbor. It was also celebrated as a seat of learning. It figured as a powerful independent maritime republic, reaching the height of its power in the period following the establishment of Macedonian rule in the East. Under the Romans it long enjoyed a semi-independent position. After forming part of the Byzantine Empire, it passed to the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem, who held it from 1309 to 1522, when, after a heroic resistance, it capitulated to the Turks under Solyman the Magnificent. The knights soon after established themselves at Malta.

Rhodes, Inner and Outer. See Appenzell.

Rhodes, a banking post-village of Marshall co., Iowa, on the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul R. Pop. about 450.

Rhodes, a post-village of Gladwin co., Mich., on the Michigan Central R. The banking point is Gladwin. Pop. 100.

Rhodesia, ro-dee'she-a, a region of southern Africa, under British domination, lying broadly between lat. 8° 30′ and 22° S., and bounded by Angola, the Congo Free State, German East Africa, the British Central African Protectorate, Portuguese East Africa, the Transvaal Colony, the Bechuana country, and German Southwest Africa. It is divided into two main divisions, Northern Rhodesia and Southern Rhodesia, the Zambezi River forming the dividing line. Southern Rhodesia, also known as British South Africa, corresponds in a general way to the two regions formerly designated Matabeleland and Mashonaland and has an area of about 144,000 sq. m. Its capital is Salisbury, which has superseded Buluwayo. It is governed by a resident commissioner, assisted by executive and legislative councils. Northern Rhodesia, which is included in the field of operations of the South African Company, is subdivided into Northeastern Rhodesia, whose boundary extends to Lake Tanganyika and whose area is thought to cover about 120,000 sq. m., and Northwestern Rhodesia or Barotseland. Much of the region of Rhodesia is well watered and suited for agricultural pursuits, the chief crops being rice, wheat, oats, and other products of temperate regions. Coffee is also grown and some rubber is exported. Gold is extensively mined, the gold-fields area being thought to cover not less than 5000 sq. m. The gold product for the year 1903 was 231,872 ounces. Other minerals are silver, copper, lead, zinc, antimony, and coal, the last-named occurring in vast and important deposits near the Zambezi in the region of Wankie (Wankeis). The chief towns and stations are Buluwayo, Salisbury, and Umtali, which are on the Cape and Beira railway; Victoria, Gwelo, and Inyati. A railway extends from Buluwayo to the Victoria Falls, on the Zambezi River. The European population of Southern Rhodesia in 1901 was 11,032; of Northeastern Rhodesia in 1903, 241.

Rhodesia, a British station in Northeastern Rhodesia, Africa, near the NE. border of Lake Mweru (Moero).

Rhodez, a town of France. See RODEZ.

Rhodope (ro'do-pe) Mountains, or Despoto-Dagh, dĕs-po'to dåg, a mountain-chain of European Turkey, in Eastern Rumelia, is the most southerly lofty arm of the Balkans, lying partly in Macedonia and partly in Thrace, and having an easterly trend directed to the Maritza, the basin of which it bounds on the SW. The loftiest summit is the Muss-Alla, 9600 feet.

Rhome, a banking post-village of Wise co., Tex., on the Fort Worth and Denver City R. Pop. about 450.

Rhön, rön, a mountain-chain of central Germany, on the borders of northwestern Bavaria, the Thuringian states, and Hesse-Nassau, separates the valleys of the Fulda and Werra from those of the Kinzig and Main. In it are the traces of many extinct volcanoes. The highest summit is the Wasserkuppe, in the Hohe Rhön, and near the source of the Fulda, 3115 feet.

Rhondda, a coal-mining district of Glamorganshire, Wales, S. of Merthyr Tydfil, recently constituted a municipality. It is a great seat of the iron-industry. Pop. in 1891, 88,351; in 1901, 113,735.

Rhöndorf, a village and summer-resort of Rhenish Prussia, on the Rhine, 3½ miles from Königswinter.

Rhone, rōn (Fr. Rhône, rōn; anc. Rho'danus), a river of Europe, rises in Switzerland, in the Rhone Glacier, between the Furka and Grimsel mountains, flows SW. past Brieg and Sion to Martigny (near the former head of Lake Geneva), where it turns sharply to the NW., and enters the Lake of Geneva (at Bouveret) near its E. extremity. At Geneva it leaves the SW. part of the lake and shortly afterwards enters French territory, passing through a spur of the Jura Mountains in the famous river-sink or gorge known as the Perte du Rhône. The course of the river is now S., passing Seyssel, and then tortuously W. to Lyons, where it receives the Saône. From this point it flows nearly due S., past Vienne, Valence, Avignon, Beaucaire, and Tarascon, to Arles, where it separates into several branches, forming a delta called La Camargue (or Île de La Camargue, with a total area of about 300 sq. m.), and enters the Gulf of Lyons, in the Mediterranean, by two main arms, the Petit Rhône (in the W.) and the navigable Grand Rhône (in the E.). The annual discharge of Rhone sediment is about 22,000,000 cubic yards, and the encroaches of the land upon the sea at the mouth of the river are extraordinarily rapid. In a period of less than 200 years the land-surface had extended seaward 4½ miles. Principal affluents, on the right, are the Ain, Saône, Ardèche, and Gard; on the left, the Isère, Drôme, and Durance. The total length of the Rhone is about 500 miles, of which some 160 miles (inclusive of the Lake Geneva section) are in Switzerland. The river becomes navigable at Le Parc, France, about 20 miles from the Swiss frontier; ocean vessels ascend to Arles. Canals connect the stream with the waters of the Loire, Seine, Yonne, and Rhine. At Arles the Rhone, although much narrower below this point, attains a width of almost exactly 1 mile.

Rhône, a department of France, in the SE., formed of the old provinces of Lyonnais and Beaujolais, bounded E. by the Rhone and the Saône, which unite here. Area, 1077 sq. m. It is in great part mountainous, with elevations exceeding 3000 feet. There are mines of copper, iron, and coal. The department produces excellent wine. There are great plantations of mulberries, which nourish vast numbers of silk-worms, and large forests of chestnut-trees. The goat-milk cheese of Mont d'Or is in high repute. The silks of Lyons are sent to all parts of the world, and great quantities of muslins are manufactured at Tarare. Other branches of industry are represented on a large scale. Capital, Lyons.

Rhone, a post-village of Luzerne co., Pa. The banking point is Nanticoke. Pop. about 400.

Rhône, Bouches du. See BOUCHES-DU-RHÔNE.

Rhone Glacier, an ice-sheet of Switzerland, just beyond the eastern wall of the Bernese Oberland and N. of the Furka Pass, and fed by the snows of the Dammastock, Galenstock, and other mountains. It is about 6 miles in length and gives origin to the Rhone River. It is in a state of recession, and was formerly of vast extent.

Rhonesboro, a village of Upshur co., Tex. The banking point is Gilmer. Pop. 200.

Rhuddlan, h'rĭтн'lan, a decayed town of Wales, in Flintshire, in the Vale of Clwyd, 3 miles NNW. of St. Asaph. It has remains of a noble mediæval castle. It was an important place in the Middle Ages and was made a borough by Edward I. Pop. about 1000.

Rhyl, h'rĭl, a town and watering-place of Wales, in Flintshire, on the Irish Sea and at the mouth of the Clwyd, 13 miles ENE. of Conway. Pop. in 1901, 8473.

Rhymer, a post-village of Collin co., Tex. Pop. 70.

Rhymney, a town of England, in Monmouthshire, 20 miles N. of Cardiff. It has large iron-works. Pop. in 1901, 7914.

Rhyn'dacus (Turk. Edrenos, ĕd'rå-nos'), a river of Asia Minor, rises about 40 miles SW. of Kutaia, flows mostly NW., traverses Lake Abulonia, and enters the Sea of Marmora.

Rhyolite Peak, Colo., a peak of the Front Range, in lat. 38° 47′ N., lon. 105° 9′ W. Elevation, 10,400 feet.

Riad, re-ăd', or Er-Riad, ER-RIAD', a city of Arabia, capital of the Wahabi state in Nejd, about 450 miles NE. of Mecca. Lat. 24° 40′ N.; lon. 46° 30′ E. Pop. about 30,000. It supplanted Derayeh as the centre of the Wahabis in the early part of the nineteenth century.

Rials, a post-village of Simpson co., Miss., 40 miles E. of Hazlehurst. Pop. 100.

Rialto, re-al'to, a post-village of San Bernardino co., Cal., on the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé R. The banking point is San Bernardino. Pop. about 300.

Rialto, a post-station of Chatham co., N.C.

Rians, re-ôNs', a town of France, in Var, 20 miles NW. of Brignolle. Pop. about 1500.

Riau-Lingga, a group of islands lying E. of Sumatra and off the SE. entrance to Malacca Strait and constituting part of a residency or division in the Dutch East Indies. The largest island is Lingga.

Riaza, re-ă'thå, a river of Spain, in Old Castile, province of Segovia, flows NNW. and joins the Douro.

Riaza, a town of Spain, province and 33 miles ENE. of Segovia, on the river Riaza. Pop. about 2000.

Riazan, Russia. See RYAZAN.

Ribadeo, re-bå-dā'o, a seaport of Spain, on the E. boundary of Galicia, province of Lugo. Pop. (commune) in 1900, 8847.

Riba Riba, a group of villages of the Congo Free State, on the upper Congo, in about lat. 2° 30′ S., lon. 25° 30′ E.

Ribarroja, re-BAR-RO'HÅ, a commune of Spain, in Catalonia, 50 miles W. of Tarragona, on the Ebro. Pop. 2000.

Ribarroja, a commune of Spain, province and 12 miles NW. of Valencia. Pop. about 3500.

Ribble, a river of England, rises in the W. part of Yorkshire, flows S. and W. through Lancashire, and enters the Irish Sea at Southport.

Ribchester, a small town of Lancashire, England, on the Ribble, 5½ miles from Blackburn.

Richmond, an independent city and port of entry of Virginia, the capital of the state, formerly in Henrico co., is situated on the N. bank of the James River, at the lower falls, and at the head of tide-water, 125 miles above its mouth and 100 miles in a straight line S. by W. of Washington. Lat. of capitol, 37° 32′ 17″ N.; lon. 77° 27′ 28″ W. It is connected with Manchester, on the S. side of the river, by several bridges, and the city is also connected by bridge with Belle Isle. The chief railroads centring in or passing through Richmond are the Chesapeake and Ohio, the Southern, the Atlantic Coast, the Norfolk and Western, and the Seaboard Air lines. The city has direct steamer communication with New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and other ports.

Richmond, which is one of the most interesting cities of the southern United States, and the chief industrial centre of its state, is regularly laid out, and contains a number of imposing public edifices. Occupying a nearly central position, on Shockoe Hill, and in Capitol Square, is the capitol (or state-house), designed in part after the Maison Carrée at Nîmes, France, and dating from 1785. Near by are the city-hall, St. Paul's church, the state library (with upward of 100,000 volumes), post-office, and governor's mansion. Other noted buildings and institutions are the "White House of the Confederacy," or Jefferson Davis Mansion (now a Museum of Confederate Relics), Chief-Justice Marshall's house, masonic temple, Exposition Buildings, Soldiers' Home, and Valentine Museum (mainly archæological and historical). Among the more notable sculptural works of the city are the Crawford monumental group of Washington, Houdon's statue of Washington, and the statue of Robert E. Lee by Mercié. The city is provided with a fine system of parks (Reservoir, Monroe, Jefferson, Marshall, Chimborazo, etc.) and has a national cemetery and the more famous Hollywood Cemetery, the latter containing the graves of presidents Monroe and Tyler, John Randolph, Jefferson Davis, and Commodore Maury. The foremost educational institutions are Richmond College (Baptist), Union Theological Seminary (Presbyterian), Medical College of Virginia, University College of Medicine, Women's College, and the Hartshorn Memorial College and Virginia Union University (1899), the last two for colored.

The industrial and commercial interests of Richmond relate almost wholly to a domestic trade, the foreign commerce being as yet insignificant. The city is one of the leading tobacco markets of the country, manufacturing chewing and smoking tobacco, snuff, cigars, and cigarettes (the last-named alone being turned out to the number of several hundred millions annually). Hardly less important than the tobacco-industry is that of iron manufactures, the city being largely engaged in the manufacture of locomotives, axles, railroad-spikes, nails, horseshoes, agricultural implements, etc. It has also fertilizer- and chemical-works, extensive manufactures of wooden-ware and paper, and carries on some ship-building.

Richmond was laid out in 1733 and incorporated in 1742. In 1779 it became the state capital. In 1861 it was made the capital of the Southern Confederacy and became the objective point of the principal military operations of the Union forces in the East. After an obstinate siege, it was evacuated on the night of April 2, 1865, and on the following day was entered by the Federal army. The warehouses were fired by the retiring Confederates and the greater portion of the business part of the city was destroyed. In 1800 the population was 5737; in 1850, 27,570; in 1860, 37,910; in 1870, 51,038; in 1880, 63,600; in 1890, 81,388; in 1900, 85,050, nearly one-half of whom were colored.

Rio Grande (Sp. pron. ree'o grån'då), Rio Grande del Norte (Sp. pron. ree'o grån'då del nor'tå, "Great River of the North"), or Rio Bravo del Norte ("Rapid River of the North"), a river of North America, rises in the San Juan Mountains, in the SW. part of Colorado, near lat. 37° 40′ N. and lon. 107° 30′ W. It takes at first an easterly and then southeasterly course, traversing the San Luis Valley, enters and crosses New Mexico, and from El Paso to the sea forms the boundary between Texas and Mexico. It enters the Gulf of Mexico by several arms (which are largely obstructed by bars) at the S. extremity of Texas, in about lat. 26° N. The volume of water discharged by this river is small in proportion to its length, which is estimated at 1800 miles. It is generally a shallow stream and is too much obstructed by sand-banks or rapids to be available for important navigation. Small steamboats can ascend it in stages of high-water nearly 500 miles. Its largest affluents are the Pecos, in Texas, and the Conchos, in Mexico. The water of the Rio Grande is largely used for irrigation purposes in New Mexico, and for this reason the river-bed at times appears dry for long distances, both above and below El Paso. The area drained by the Rio Grande is computed to be 240,000 sq. m.

Rochester, a city, capital of Monroe co., N.Y., is situated on both sides of the Genesee River, 7 miles above its mouth in Lake Ontario (where is Charlotte, its lake-port) and 70 miles ENE. of Buffalo, on the New York Central and Hudson River, the Erie, the Lehigh Valley, the Pennsylvania and other railroads. Lat. 43° 8′ N.; lon. 77° 51′ W. The city is divided into almost equal parts by the Genesee, which here descends 260 feet within 3 miles and has perpendicular falls of 96, 26, and 84 feet respectively. The first of these is located in the heart of the city and affords immense water-power. Rochester covers an area of about 19 sq. m. and lies in heights generally not more than 250–300 feet above lake-level. The city is regularly laid out and shows beautiful prospects in its well-shaded streets and boulevards. It has large areas of parks and gardens, Genesee Valley and Seneca parks being particularly noted for their picturesque beauty. The river is spanned by numerous bridges. Main Street is the virtual geographic centre of the city and crosses the river over a handsome substantial bridge, on both sides of which are erected large business blocks. Another remarkable bridge structure is the aqueduct (848 feet long and 45 feet wide), by which the Erie Canal crosses the Genesee River. Among the more notable public buildings of the city are the court-house, city-hall, state arsenal, chamber of commerce, state industrial school, state hospital for the insane, and the Western New York Institution for Deaf Mutes. The leading educational institutions are the University of Rochester (Baptist), opened in 1850, which has extensive geological and mineralogical cabinets, Rochester Theological Seminary, Mechanics' Institute, Wagner Memorial College, and the Reynolds and other libraries. Rochester has extensive and varied industries, the more conspicuous manufactures being those of clothing, boots and shoes, cigars, machine-shop products, furniture, agricultural implements, wagons and carriages, malted liquors, flour, and photographic appliances and optical goods. The breweries, flouring-mills, and establishments for the manufacture of optical goods and photographers' supplies are particularly noteworthy. Rochester is also a leading city in the nursery business of the United States and has an immense trade in garden-seeds, fruits, plants, and trees. The first settler came to the site of Rochester as early as 1788, but the settlement did not actually begin until 1810. In 1817 the village of Rochesterville was incorporated. Five years later the name was changed to Rochester. The place was incorporated as the city of Rochester in 1834, since which time it has steadily prospered and grown in population, wealth, and importance. Pop. in 1815, 331; in 1820, 1502; in 1830, 9207; in 1840, 20,191; in 1850, 36,403; in 1860, 48,204; in 1870, 62,386; in 1875, 81,813; in 1880, 89,366; in 1890, 133,896; in 1900, 162,608.

Rocky Mountains, the most extensive mountain-system of the North American continent, occupying its western portion and extending almost continuously from the Mexican frontier to Alaska and the region of the Arctic Ocean. In a broader sense the term includes the Sierra Nevada and the Coast and Cascade ranges, but by most geographers it is restricted to the interior ranges, which are then known as the Rocky Mountains proper. In this place the latter alone will be considered and the reader is referred for the other divisions to their respective headings. The full relations of the Alaskan mountains (with their highest summits, Mount McKinley, 20,464 feet; St. Elias, 18,016 ft.; Logan, etc.) have not yet been ascertained. The Rocky Mountains pursue in their main chains a generally SE.–NW. course through the United States and Canada. On their eastern side they are usually abruptly defined from the great undulating plains that press to their base. The system is in parts of great width, covering nearly a thousand miles, and is constructed of a large number of subordinate ridges and swells and included lofty plateaus, a feature that is remarkably developed in the southwestern United States. The principal ranges connected with this system have received different names and some of them are known by several synonyms. Among them are the Snowy Range (or "Continental Divide"), Front Range, Wind River Mountains, Laramie Range, Medicine Bow Range, Elk Mountains, Park Range, Big Horn Mountains, Bitter Root Mountains, Sangre de Cristo Range, Saguache Mountains, Uintah Mountains, Uncompahgre Mountains, Wasatch Mountains, and Selkirk Mountains (the last-named in Canada). These are separately noticed under their proper heads, as well as the more distinctive features,—such as the Grand Cañon of the Colorado, the Great Basin, and the Yellowstone National Park,—which are a part of the Rocky Mountain region.

The main line of the Rocky Mountains is in the United States constituted by what is collectively known as the Eastern Range, which enters Montana from Canada as the Main Divide and unites in the southwestern part of that state with a prolongation of the Bitter Root Mountains. Beyond the Yellowstone National Park in Wyoming the principal axis is that of the Wind River Mountains, which contain the lofty Fremont Peak, 13,790 feet. A remarkable break in the continuity of the mountain-mass is found in southeastern Wyoming, where south of the Laramie Mountains an evenly graded plateau-surface of over 8000 ft. elevation, which is traversed by one of the transcontinental lines of railroad, takes the place of true mountains. In the Front Range of Colorado, which abuts upon or is continued southward by the Sangre de Cristo Range, are found some of the loftiest summits of the entire system, including Pike's Peak, 14,108 ft. In Sierra Blanca (or Blanca Peak) the Sangre de Cristo Range contains the highest elevation of the system (excluding Alaska), 14,390 (14,464) ft. The Rocky Mountains are continued southward into New Mexico, where the main range terminates in the vicinity of Santa Fé.

Parks.—Westward of the main range of Colorado, and extending into Wyoming, are several high mountain-valleys occupying the crest of the Cordilleran plateau and known as "Parks." These are the North, Middle, and South Parks and the San Luis Valley, the last-named covering an area of about 5000 sq. m. and presenting a surface (rising to 8000 feet) of singular uniformity of level. These Parks remove the severity from the mountain-landscape and, indeed, give to the eye the aspect of low-lying plains or undulating farm and meadow lands. The northern Parks are bounded westward by the Park Range, which contains numerous lofty summits, such as Mount Lincoln, 14,297 ft., Quandary Peak, 14,266 ft., etc.

Plateaus.—In the western part of Colorado the mountain-system swells out into lofty, flat-topped plateaus, which drop abruptly to lower levels through vertical escarpments (Roan Cliffs, Book Cliffs, etc.). This system of heights is continued through the eastern half of Utah and southward into Arizona, where the streams have cut some of the most profound gorges known on the earth's surface, revealing sections of the earth's strata over a mile in thickness. To a portion of this elevated plateau, which is incised by the Colorado River and its tributaries, the name of Colorado Plateau has been given. See GRAND CAÑON OF THE COLORADO.

Peaks, Snow, etc.—Among the loftier or better known summits of the Rocky Mountains, besides those to which reference has already been made, may be mentioned, in New Mexico, Cerro Blanco (14,269 feet), Las Trucas Mountain (13,150 ft.), Santa Fé Baldy Peak (12,661 ft.), Taos Peak (13,145 ft.); in Colorado, Gray's Peak (14,341 ft.), Long's Peak (14,271 ft.), Mount Rosalie (14,340 ft.), Torrey Peak (14,336 ft.), Uncompahgre Peak (14,289 ft.), Mount Harvard (14,375 ft.), Mount Yale (14,187 ft.), Mount Princeton (14,196 ft.), Mountain of the Holy Cross (14,006 ft.); in Utah, Gilbert Peak (13,687 ft.), Mount Peale (13,089 ft.), Emmons Peak (13,624 ft.), Leidy Peak (12,250 ft.); in Wyoming, Grand Teton (13,671 ft.), Wind River Peak (13,499 ft.), West Atlantic Peak (12,634 ft.), Mount Hooker (12,900 ft.), Atlantic Peak (12,794 ft.), Mount Chauvenet (13,000 ft.); in Idaho, Hyndman Peak (12,078 ft.); and in Montana, Mount Douglas (11,300 ft.), Mount Cowen (11,190 ft.), Crazy Peak (11,178 ft.), Electric Peak (11,155 ft.). The greater number of these summits rise considerably above the theoretical snow-line and present snow-caps of fairly great magnitude, but it is only in a very few cases that the snow-covering is sufficient to develop glaciers. There is no glacier of the first magnitude found S. of the Canadian boundary. Many even of the loftiest summits, such as Pike's Peak, for example, are destitute of snow during the heated summer months, the deficiency of precipitation in the far interior region not permitting of a sufficiently heavy snow-fall to withstand the summer heat. In this general absence of glaciers and of the eternal snow-cap, this section of the Rocky Mountains is eminently distinguished in its scenic aspect from the Alps. The American mountains, in addition, lack generally the bold and serrated forms of the mountains of Switzerland, and they are also lacking in the charming lakes which so beautifully diversify the landscape of the Swiss Alps. A considerable part of the Rocky Mountains is still heavily timbered, noble forests of coniferous trees extending to 10,000 and 11,000 ft. The timber-line on Pike's Peak is found at 11,700 ft., on Long's and Gray's Peaks at 11,100 ft., on Sierra Blanca at 10,400 ft., on Mount Washburn, in Wyoming, at 9900 ft., and on Electric Peak, in Montana, at 9400 ft.

The main Rocky Mountains in Canada are still imperfectly known, but recent surveys have shown them to be much more rugged or distinctly Alpine than their continuations in the United States. Their highest elevations appear to be centred around the head-waters of the Saskatchewan and Athabasca rivers, in about lat. 51° N., where numerous peaks (Columbia, Bryce, Forbes, Alberta, Bush, Freshfield, etc.) are described as rising to between 12,500 and 14,000 feet. In this region there are vast glaciers (Columbia Glacier, Lyell Glacier, Forbes Glacier, Wilson Glacier, Bush Glacier), which help to give the region a distinctly Alpine character. West of this main range is the subordinate one of the Selkirks, several of whose summits rise above 10,000 ft. (Sir Donald, 10,645 ft.; Dawson, 10,800 ft.; Bonney, 10,625 ft.). In this tract are the Illecillewaet, Asulkan, Deville, and Duncan glaciers. It would seem that in the middle Yukon and Mackenzie districts the mountains as a well-defined system of heights disappear, the water-parting between the Mackenzie and Pelly (or Yukon) basins being merely undulating lowland. The higher crests reappear in the farther North.

Passes.—The Rocky Mountains are traversed by numerous passes, some of which attain a very great elevation. Among these are, in Colorado, the Argentine Pass (13,286 feet), Berthoud's Pass, Hagerman Pass (11,530 ft.), traversed by a railroad, Marshall Pass (10,858 ft.), also traversed by a railroad, Fremont's Pass (11,313 ft.), Veta Pass (9390 ft.), and the Poncho Pass (9044 ft.); in Wyoming, Bridger and South passes; and in Montana, the Madison or Raynolds and Union passes.

Geology, etc.—The main ranges of the Rocky Mountain system consist of a nucleus of granite or gneiss, flanked by slates and schists and fossiliferous rocks of virtually all the formations from the Cambrian to the Tertiary. It would seem that the full height of the mountains was not attained until late in the Tertiary period. Igneous and volcanic rocks abound in the mountains, more particularly of Montana, Idaho, and Wyoming, both in the form of intruded dykes and of vast overflow sheets of lava or basalt. The past volcanic activity in the north is perhaps still indicated in the geyser phenomena of the Yellowstone National Park. Numerous volcanic cones are scattered about the southern terminals of the system in Arizona and New Mexico. Among the loftier volcanic summits that properly belong to the Rocky Mountains are the San Francisco Mountain, in northern Arizona, 12,794 feet, and the Spanish Peaks of Colorado, 13,620 ft.

Rich mines of gold, silver, copper, iron, and lignite (Cretaceous and Tertiary coal) have been opened in various parts of the region occupied by the mountains, which contain many other useful minerals and metals, to which reference in this place is not necessary. The metallic wealth of the different sections is treated of in the special articles devoted to the states and territories.

Fauna.—The animal life of the Rocky Mountains is largely that of the western half of the continent generally, with many forms which have a markedly extensive N. and S. range. As a divide between the river systems of the E. and the W., the mountain barrier is at the same time the determinant of the boundaries of the respective faunas of these streams, establishing, especially among the fishes, clearly defined eastern and western provinces. Among the animals that are more generally associated with the Rocky Mountain region are the grizzly bear, the big-horn (sheep), Rocky Mountain goat (a caprine antelope), prong-horn (inhabiting the plains), northern caribou, Rocky Mountain lion (puma), and many species of gopher.

Rome (L., It., Sp., and Port. Roma, ro'må; Fr. Rome; Ger. Rom, rōm), the most celebrated city of the world, capital of the spiritual empire of the popes and, since 1871, of the kingdom of Italy, is situated on the Tiber, 17 miles NE. of its mouth in the Mediterranean Sea. The city occupies chiefly the left bank of the river and lies in an undulating plain (a portion of which is the ancient Campus Martius) and on the slopes and summits of surrounding heights,—the famous "Seven Hills of Rome," the Capitoline, Palatine, Aventine, Quirinal, Viminal, Esquiline, and Cælian Hills. Prior to the establishment of Rome as the capital of united Italy there were but few modern residence-sites on the historic hills, whose ancient ruins were buried beneath garden-crops and vineyards. Lat. of St. Peter's 41° 54′ 6″ N.; lon. 12° 27′ 14″ E. Elevation of the site of St. Peter's above the sea, 95 feet. Pop. in 1871, 229,357; in 1881, of the city, 285,544 (commune, 300,467); in 1901, 424,943 (commune, 462,783). That portion of the city which lies on the W. or right bank of the Tiber is constituted by the quarters known as the Borgo in the N. (with the church of St. Peter's, the Vatican, and the castle of Sant' Angelo) and Trastevere in the S., connected with each other by the Via della Lungara. On this side is Monte Gianicolo, the ancient Janiculum. The ancient wall of Rome, the greater portion of which dates from the latter part of the third century, measures on the left bank about 10 miles, is on the outside 55 feet in height, and is pierced by 13 gates. The most famous of these is the Porta del Popolo (constructed in its present form in 1561), through which passed the ancient Via Flaminia (the chief highway connecting Rome with the N. and E. of the peninsula), and where to-day, in the Piazza del Popolo, terminates the broad Corso Umberto Primo, the most fashionable concourse of the modern city. The Tiber, within the walls, occupies largely an artificial channel (excavated in 1876) and has a winding course of 3 miles. Its navigation is insignificant. The stream (which is crossed by a dozen or more bridges) has an average width of about 180–190 ft. and a depth of some 20 ft., which is, however, frequently more than doubled as the result of heavy rains. Near the southern part of its course it sweeps around the Isola Tiberina, an island about 900 ft. long, connected with the main-land by 2 bridges. The Ponte Sant' Angelo, the ancient Pons Ælius, connects the main portion of the city with the castle or citadel of Sant' Angelo, a large circular structure, which was erected by the emperor Hadrian as a mausoleum for himself in A.D. 136 and in which the remains of numerous later emperors were interred. A restoration of this interesting edifice, which at one time served as a state prison, was undertaken in 1901. The city has to-day, perhaps, the best water-supply of any of the capitals of Europe, some of the ancient aqueducts having been made serviceable in carrying the water-courses from distant localities across the Campagna. The climate of Rome was until recently considered unhealthy during the warm season, owing to the malarial exhalations from the Campagna. The draining of the marshy stretches around the city has, however, effected a great improvement in this respect. From the mildness of its winter climate it is a favorite resort for invalids. Mean temperature of January, 47.3°; of July, 78.4°. The tramontana, or N. wind, is often attended by severe storms. The sirocco, or S. wind, is debilitating in summer. Frost seldom lasts over the night and snow falls on an average only 1½ days in the year.

Notwithstanding its architectural and artistic riches, modern Rome lacks the imposing aspect of many other European capitals. The streets are in great part narrow and irregular; palaces and hovels are often seen side by side. Since 1871, however, an immense amount of repair, reconstruction, and improvement has been carried on, with the result of extending the city largely over the eastern hills,—from the Pincio (the Collis Hortorum of the Romans, the site of the famous gardens of Lucullus) on the N. to the Esquiline on the S. Of the most noted modern thoroughfares, besides the Corso Umberto Primo already referred to, are the Corso Vittorio Emanuele, with its continuation, the Via Nazionale; the Via Sistina, with its continuation, the Via Quatro Fontane; and the Via del Quirinale, with its continuation, the Via Venti Settembre. Among the open squares may be mentioned the Piazza Colonna, one of the busiest squares of the city, containing the lofty column of Marcus Aurelius; the Piazza Navona, or Circo Agonale, which occupies the Stadium of Domitian; the Piazza di Spagna, with the Scala di Spagna descending to it, the artist's centre of the city; Piazza di Termini; Piazza del Quirinale; and the Piazza Cavour and Piazza di San Pietro, on the W. side of the Tiber. The most notable architectural monuments of modern Rome are its churches, and foremost among these is the cathedral of St. Peter's (San Pietro in Vaticano), the largest and most sumptuous ecclesiastical edifice in the world. Begun in its present form in 1506, by Pope Julius II., its construction occupied 126 years. It was planned and commenced by Bramante, and carried on by Raphael, Peruzzi, Sangallo, Michael Angelo, and others, the great dome, rising with its summit cross to a height of 435 feet above the pavement, or 308 ft. above the roof, being the masterpiece of Michael Angelo. The cathedral covers an area of 18,000 square yards and measures (exclusive of the portico) 636 ft. in length. The height of the nave is 151 ft. The approach to the cathedral from the E. is through the imposing Piazza di San Pietro, which is flanked by the great curving colonnades erected in 1667 by Bernini. In the centre of the square is the obelisk brought from Heliopolis by the emperor Caligula. The church of St. John Lateran, located in the SE. corner of the city, is the mother church of Rome. It occupies the site of a palace presented to the bishop of Rome by Constantine the Great. The edifice is in part a mediæval and in part a modern structure. The five general councils known as the Lateran Councils have given celebrity to this basilica, which contains the Scala Santa and the Corsini chapels. The basilica of Santa Maria Maggiore, dating in part from the fifth century, is one of the five patriarchal churches of the city. Hardly less famous is the ancient church of Santa Maria in Aracœli. One of the oldest churches is San Pietro in Vincoli, founded by the empress Eudosia about 442, repeatedly restored, and now thoroughly modernized. San Paolo fuori le Mura, at the S. end of the city, near the Porta San Paolo, was founded in 388 on the site of a small church of Constantine. Before the great fire of 1823, which destroyed the building almost completely, it was considered the most interesting church in Rome. The present edifice is noted for its sumptuous interior.

No city of the world outside of Italy compares with Rome in the fame and art treasures of its palaces, among which the Vatican, the residence of the popes, stands pre-eminent. This extraordinary edifice, the work of many ages, contains probably not less than 1000 halls, chapels, and private apartments. Of these the most noted are the Sala Regia, the Cappella Sistina, or Sistine Chapel (with the great ceiling-painting by Michael Angelo, as well as this master's "Last Judgment"), the Stanze di Raffaello (with frescoes and paintings by Raphael), the Logge di Raffaello, and the halls and galleries containing the vast Vatican collections of paintings, sculpture, and antiquities,—the whole presenting an array of masterpieces which is not approached anywhere in the world. The Vatican library, which contains nearly 40,000 manuscripts, many of them of almost priceless value, is in the keeping of a cardinal. To it was added in 1902 the Biblioteca Barberiniana. The palace of the Quirinal, the construction of which was begun in 1574, has been since 1871 the residence of the king of Italy. Of the numerous other palaces of the city, many of which are noted for their art treasures, may be mentioned the Palazzo del Laterano (adjoining the Lateran basilica and containing the Gregorian Museum), the Barberini, Borghese, Colonna, Corsini, Doria, and Rospigliosi palaces (the last containing Guido Reni's "Aurora"), the Palace of the Conservatori (with the new Capitoline collections), and the Capitoline Museum, on the Campidoglio (or Capitoline Hill), with a collection of ancient sculptures only second to that of the Vatican. On the Piazza di Campidoglio stands the famous equestrian statue of Marcus Aurelius. The villas or residences of Roman nobles are situated amidst charming gardens, ornamented with fountains and statues. The most noted are the Villa Borghese on the Pincian hill, the Villa Medici (now occupied by a French academy of art), Villa Albani, Villa Doria-Pamfili, Villa Torlonia, and Villa Farnesina. The city is adorned with many fountains, the most splendid of which is the Fontana Trevi. Among modern sculptural monuments the equestrian statue of Garibaldi, erected in 1895, is the most striking. The great national monument to Victor Emmanuel II., near the Campidoglio, begun in 1885, is not yet completed. Of the many scientific and literary institutions the university of Rome (Università della Sapienza, or now officially Regia Università degli Studi), founded by Boniface VIII., holds first rank. It possesses faculties of law, physical science, medicine, and philology, and has various collections of natural history. The enrolled students for the year 1904–05 numbered 2685. To the Collegio Romano, which was founded by the Jesuits and which has been officially superseded by the Universitas Gregoriana, belong the vast Museo Etnografico and Museo Kircheriano. The Collegio di Propaganda Fide, founded by Gregory XV. in 1622, prepares for missionary service in all parts of the globe. Next to the library of the Vatican, the chief public libraries are the Casanatense, with 120,000 volumes and 6500 MSS.; the Angelica library, with 95,000 printed volumes; the Alessandrina library (belonging to the university), with upward of 100,000 volumes; and the Biblioteca Centrale Vittorio Emanuele (formed in 1871 from the libraries of the Jesuits and suppressed convents), with about 550,000 volumes. Besides the museums of the Vatican and the Capitol, the public collections comprise museums of anatomy, natural history, mineralogy, antiquities, and mosaics, and there are numerous and valuable private collections. Rome has schools of painting and archæology (some of them belonging to foreign institutes) and music, numerous charitable and benevolent institutions, and hospitals. The United States maintains schools of architecture and classical studies. A large military hospital was erected in 1885–87. Foremost among the associations of savants are the Accademia dei Lincei (or Royal Academy of Sciences), Accademia Pontifica dei Nuovi Lincei, Accademia degli Arcadi, Accademia di San Luca (with school of art), Accademia Medica, etc. The chief industry of the inhabitants of Rome is connected with the production of articles of art and the supply of the numerous artists, invalids, and other visitors; its manufactures, which are unimportant, are confined to silk fabrics, hats, gloves, strings for musical instruments, artificial flowers, false pearls, mosaics, jewelry, cameos, terra-cotta, velvets, leather, furniture, glass, candles, soap, and pottery.

The more famous remains of ancient Rome comprise the Forum Romanum, with the remains of numerous temples (of Vesta, Saturn, Concord, Vespasian, Cæsar, Castor and Pollux, Faustina), triumphal arches and tribune; the Pantheon (the modern church of Santa Maria Rotonda), a great domed temple in a state of perfect preservation, containing the tombs of Raphael, Victor Emmanuel II., and Humbert; the Circus Maximus (which is thought to have accommodated 200,000 spectators); the Colosseum (or Amphitheatrum Flavium, one of the most imposing buildings of the world, erected by Vespasian and dedicated by Titus in A.D. 80, measuring 1720 feet in circumference, and accommodating nearly 50,000 seated spectators); remains of the theatres of Marcellus and of Pompey, the palace of the Cæsars, the mausoleum of Augustus, the tomb of Cæcilia Metella (on the Appian way), various columbaria, the Mamertine prisons, the Prætorian camp, the fountain of Egeria, a part of the Thermæ (baths) of Agrippa, those of Caracalla, Diocletian, Nero, Titus, etc., the triumphal arches of Titus, Constantine, and Septimius Severus, the columns of Antoninus and Trajan, the Cloaca Maxima (an extensive drainage-conduit), the Pyramid of Cestius, the palaces of the emperors on the Palatine Hill, the Stadium, and the Pædagogium (school for imperial slaves). The famous catacombs extend beneath the city in a wide circle. More than 40 of these subterranean passages have been discovered. The most famous are the catacombs of Calixtus, Domitilla, Saint Peter and Marcellinus, Praetextatus, and Priscilla.

History.—Rome first appears in history as a member of a confederacy of Latin towns clustered in a small region between the Apennines and the sea, which in the course of centuries were brought under her sway. Down to the close of the fourth century B.C. her dominions extended only over a small territory. The conquests of the next three hundred years made her mistress of the circum-Mediterranean world. According to the chronological reckoning of the Romans (based on tradition) the city was founded about 753 B.C. The little city-state appears to have been at first governed by kings. Towards the close of the sixth century B.C. (according to the common chronology) royalty was abolished and a republican government instituted, with two consuls at the head of the state. At the close of the first century B.C. the republican government was succeeded by imperial rule. At this time the intellectual activity of Rome was at its height.

The following are some of the principal landmarks in the history of the territorial development of Rome: Beginning of the Samnite wars, about 343 B.C.; final subjugation of Latium (which, after a period of submission, had revolted against Rome), about 338 B.C.; subjugation of the Samnites, about 290 B.C.; subjugation of the Etrurians completed, Rome mistress of Italy (the peninsular part of what is now Italy), 265 B.C.; first war with Carthage (first Punic War), 264–241 B.C., resulting in the extension of Roman dominion beyond the bounds of Italy by the ejection of the Carthaginians from Sicily, and the relinquishment soon after by Carthage of Sardinia and Corsica; conquest of Cisalpine Gaul, 225–222 B.C.; second Punic War, 219–201 B.C.—the Carthaginian power in Spain supplanted by that of Rome; Rome puts an end to the Macedonian overlordship in Greece, 197 B.C.; first war in Asia, the Romans force Antiochus the Great of Syria to surrender the greater part of Asia Minor (most of which is handed over to the king of Pergamum), 192–190 B.C.; destruction of the Macedonian kingdom, 168 B.C.; third Punic War, ending in the destruction of Carthage, 149–146 B.C.; Greece made a Roman province, 146 B.C.; Rome inherits the vast possessions of Pergamum, 133 B.C.; conquest of the SE. part of Transalpine Gaul, 125–121 B.C.; war with Jugurtha, king of Numidia, 111–106 B.C. (Numidia made a Roman province half a century later); wars with Mithridates, king of Pontus, 88–65 B.C.; Syria annexed, 64 B.C.; Judea made tributary, 63 B.C.; conquest of Gaul by Cæsar, 58–51 B.C.; Egypt annexed, 30 B.C.; conquest of Spain completed, 19 B.C.; conquest of Rhætia and Vindelicia, 15 B.C.; victorious campaigns of Drusus in northern Germany, 12–9 B.C.; conquest of Pannonia completed, 9 B.C.; advance of Rome in Germany arrested by the Cherusci, A.D. 9; conquest of Britain begun, A.D. 43; destruction of Jerusalem, A.D. 70; Roman dominion in Britain extended to the Firth of Forth, A.D. 81; conquest of Dacia, A.D. 106; the Roman world attains its greatest extension by the conquest of Armenia and Mesopotamia, A.D. 115 (these territories soon lost).

In A.D. 395 occurred the final division of the Roman Empire into the Western Empire, with Rome as its capital, and the Eastern (Byzantine or Greek) Empire, with Constantinople as its capital. The Western Empire fell a prey to the invasions of the Germanic peoples, coming to an end in 476. The city of Rome was for a brief time under the rule of the Goths, who were conquered by the Byzantines in the middle of the sixth century. In the convulsions of the overthrow of the Roman Empire the temporal authority of the bishops of Rome was developed, and from the eighth century Rome figures as a papal city. (See PAPAL STATES.) Down to the sixteenth century Rome remained the ecclesiastical centre of western Christendom. In 1309 the papal see was removed to Avignon, but from 1377 Rome was again the residence of the popes. In the latter part of the Middle Ages Rome presented the appearance of a city in ruins, but with the close of the long period of strife which distracted the papacy a new Rome began to rise, and in the sixteenth century the finest efforts of the art of the Renaissance were expended upon it. In 1798–99 Rome was the capital of the Roman Republic, and from 1808–14 it was in the hands of the French. There was a second Roman Republic in 1849, which came to an end through French intervention. In 1870 Rome was annexed to the Italian kingdom, of which it was made the capital in 1871.

Rotterdam, rot'tẹr-dam' (Dutch pron. rot'tẹr-dȧm'; L. Roterodam'mum), the chief commercial port and second city in population of the Netherlands, is in South Holland, at the confluence of the Rotte with the Nieuwe (New) Maas, 43 miles SSW. of Amsterdam. Lat. 51° 55′ N.; lon. 4° 29′ E. Pop. in 1890, 209,136; in 1900, inclusive of the population of Delfshaven, Charlois, Kralingen, Ijsselmonde, etc. (suburbs that have been wholly or in part annexed), 319,866. The city, which has an inner or "old town," surrounded by new quarters, is traversed by numerous canals and is frequently designated the "Venice of the North." It is also bisected by a massive railway viaduct. The name is derived from a large dam (or dike) which marks the junction of the Rotte with the Maas. The houses of the city are largely quaint gabled edifices, constructed on piles, and overhanging their foundations. The Maas here is from 30 to 40 feet deep and permits ocean vessels of the largest draft to enter. It is bordered by vast docks, piers, and wharves, which have been built out so as to partition the river into a number of capacious basins and inner harbors. The beautiful quay known as the Boompjes forms one of the most attractive portions of the city and is at the same time a centre of the city's busy and social life. Other centring foci are the great square (or Groote Markt) and the Hoog Straat (High Street).

Rotterdam has comparatively few buildings of striking architectural effect, the most noteworthy being the Grootekerk ("Great Church"), or church of St. Laurens, completed about 1475 and having one of the finest organs in the world. Other notable buildings and institutions are the town-hall, palace of justice, exchange, central penitentiary, the Erasmian gymnasium, schools and academies of the industrial arts, painting and sculpture, music, navigation, etc., the Boyman Museum, asylums for the blind and deaf and dumb, and various important scientific associations. The city possesses a notable botanical-zoological garden.

Rotterdam is a central distributing point of trade for the Netherlands and the regions traversed by the Rhine and the Maas, the command of the water-ways giving it a position superior to that of any other city of the kingdom. The number of ocean vessels entering the harbor in 1901 was nearly 7000. The city has independent lines of steamers and vessels trading with nearly all the important ports of the world. The bulk of the exports consists of coffee, cigars and tobacco, flour, sugar, spices, provisions of nearly all kinds, cottons, dye-woods, madder, butter, cheese, whale oil, chemicals, and petroleum. Rotterdam has many distilleries, breweries, tanneries, candle- and dye-works, sugar-refineries, paint-mills, bleach-fields, etc. Its chief industry is ship-building.

Rouen, rwȧn (anc. Ratom'agus or Rotomagus), a city of France, capital of the department of Seine-Inférieure, on the right bank of the Seine, 84 miles NW. of Paris and 56 miles ESE. of Havre. Lat. 49° 26′ N.; lon. 1° 6′ E. On the site of its former fortifications there are now fine shady avenues. The old crooked and picturesque streets, with their quaintly gabled and carved timbered houses, have given way in large part to broad, handsome boulevards in the style of those of Paris, but the city has retained many fine specimens of mediæval architecture. Foremost among the many imposing edifices is the cathedral, one of the finest Gothic structures in France, erected in the thirteenth century. It is a cruciform pile surmounted by three beautiful towers, and has a richly decorated W. façade, handsome portals, magnificent rose windows, and numerous chapels, among them the Lady Chapel, containing many splendid monuments. Henry II. of England lies buried here and here was also entombed the heart of Richard Cœur-de-Lion. Rivalling the cathedral in beauty and size is the exquisite Gothic church of St. Ouen. Among other important ecclesiastical structures are the church of St. Maclou, in the flamboyant Gothic style of the fifteenth century, with a fine W. portal; the church of St. Vincent, with superb stained glass; the church of St. Patrice, also with splendid stained glass; the church of St. Godard; and the restored Romanesque church of St. Gervais, with a crypt dating from the fourth century. The most striking secular edifices are the late Gothic Palais de Justice, built for the parlement of Normandy, with profuse decorations; the Hôtel de Ville, containing a public library and picture gallery; the archiepiscopal residence; the fine Hôtel Bourgthéroulde, now used as a bank, dating from the fifteenth century; the belfry (or Tour de la Grosse Horloge); and a museum containing rich collections. The city possesses one of the most valuable libraries in France with about 140,000 volumes. An old convent houses the museum of antiquities and the museum of natural history. There is a school of medicine and pharmacy affiliated with the university of Caen. The principal public places of Rouen are the Place de l'Hôtel de Ville and the Place du Vieux-Marché, where Joan of Arc was burned and which contains a beautiful monument erected to her.

Along the Seine for a mile and a half stretch fine quays, rivalling those of Paris. The city is connected by a handsome stone bridge and by a suspension bridge with the suburb of Saint-Sever, on the opposite bank of the river. The Seine has here been artificially deepened and a spacious port has been constructed. Rouen is one of the chief seats of the textile industry in France. The principal branches of the industry carried on here are cotton-spinning and the manufacture of a variety of cotton stuffs called rouenneries. Silks are also extensively manufactured. There are chemical- and soap-works, machine-shops, iron-foundries, oil- and sugar-refineries, etc. There is an active trade.

Rouen grew into importance under the Romans. It was the capital of the duchy of Normandy. Philip Augustus took it from King John of England in 1204, but it was again held by the English for about thirty years during the first half of the fifteenth century. Pop. in 1901, 110,480 (commune, 116,316).

Rügen, rü'ghĕn, an island in the Baltic Sea, belonging to Prussia and included in the province of Pomerania, separated from the main-land by a strait in its narrowest part less than 1 mile wide. Area, 362 sq. m. It is the largest of the German islands. It is very irregular in shape, being deeply indented by bays, which cut off peninsulas. The largest of these peninsulas, Wittow, forming the northern part of the island and terminating in the N. in Cape Arkona, is almost an island. The surface of Rügen is level in the W., rises in the interior to a height of over 300 feet, and presents on the E. side steep chalky cliffs. The island is very attractive in its landscape. There are fertile fields, yielding bountiful crops of wheat and rape-seed. Large numbers of cattle and horses are reared. The fisheries, especially the herring-fishery, are important and the inhabitants are good seamen. The fine sea-bathing and the scenery render Rügen a favorite resort. Among the towns and villages are Bergen (the capital), Putbus, near which is the sea-side resort called Friedrich-Wilhelms-Bad, Garz, Sagard, Sassnitz, and Crampas, the last two being frequented watering-places. On the main-land, opposite Rügen, is Stralsund. The ancient Germanic inhabitants of Rügen were supplanted in the early part of the Middle Ages by Slavs, who were not Christianized till the twelfth century. The island passed into the possession of Sweden in 1648 and became Prussian in 1815. Pop. (including adjacent islets) in 1900, 46,270.

Rumā'nia, a kingdom of southern Europe, comprising the former principalities of Moldavia and Wallachia, the former in the NE. and the latter in the SW. It is bounded on the N. and W. by Austria-Hungary, on the E. by Russia and the Black Sea, on the S. by Bulgaria, and for a short distance on the W. by Servia. The Carpathians stretch like a great wall on the side of Austria-Hungary. The rivers Pruth and Danube separate the country from Russia. The Danube forms the greater part of the southern boundary and separates Rumania from Servia. This river traverses the SE. part of the kingdom, which includes its delta. The district between it and the Black Sea, acquired in 1878 (having been previously part of Bulgaria) is called the Dobrudja. Rumania lies between the parallels of 43° 40′ and 48° 15′ N. latitude. Area, about 50,700 sq. m. The country comprises the greater part of the vast basin of the lower Danube, and the bulk of it is a great plain, into which project (covering a large area) the spurs and foothills of the Carpathians. The NE. part of this plain, in Moldavia, is elevated, and in its formation partakes of the character of the Russian steppes. A great part of the Wallachian plain is a lowland, but slightly elevated above the level of the sea. Here the Danube has flat and marshy banks. The Dobrudja, outside of the delta region, is mainly a plateau from which rise some low mountains. The Carpathians in Wallachia attain an elevation of about 8000 feet.

Moldavia is traversed from N. to S. by the river Sereth, which joins the Danube a few miles above the influx of the Pruth. A number of large affluents of the Danube course over the Wallachian plain, the principal from W. to E. being the Schyl (Jiul), Aluta (which breaks through the Carpathians in the Red Tower Pass), Arjesh, Yalomitza, and Buseu (Buzau). Of the Rumanian rivers the Danube and Pruth alone are navigable. Sea-going vessels ascend the Danube to Braila. There are no natural harbors on the coast of the Dobrudja, but an artificial port has been created at Kustendje through the construction of great works. The climate of the country is of a continental character, with long and cold winters (the Danube mouths being ice-bound for a considerable part of the winter) and very hot summers. The average annual rainfall is only about 20 inches and droughts are frequent.

The Rumanian plains belong to the most fertile regions of Europe. They produce enormous crops of grain, especially wheat (about 75,000,000 bushels in 1902) and maize (about 115,000,000 bushels in 1901). Among other products, in addition to ordinary fruits and vegetables, are rape-seed, flax, tobacco, beets (for sugar), and wine. The vineyards and plum orchards cover a large area. There are extensive forests, largely of oaks, firs, and beeches. Rumania is a great pastoral as well as an agricultural country, cattle, sheep, horses, and swine being reared in vast numbers. The buffalo is frequently seen on the farms. Bee-keeping is an important industry. Salt and petroleum, which are obtained in abundance in the region of the Carpathians, constitute the mineral riches of the country. The manufacturing industries are still mainly of a domestic character. A beginning has, however, been made in the way of establishing modern factories. Cereals constitute the great bulk of the exports of Rumania, their value in 1902 having been about $47,000,000. The countries having the largest share of the trade with Rumania are Austria-Hungary, Germany, and Great Britain. There are about 2000 miles of railway, all belonging to the state.

The government of Rumania is a constitutional monarchy. The succession is in the male line. The legislature consists of a senate and a chamber of deputies, the members of the former being elected for eight years and those of the latter for four years. All citizens paying a tax, however small, are entitled to vote, but the suffrage is unevenly distributed, the voters being divided into classes (electoral colleges), based upon property-tax-profession qualifications, the voters in one class not having the same representation relative to numbers as those in another. The population in 1899 was 5,912,520, nearly nine-tenths being Rumans. The Jews number more than 250,000. There are about 200,000 gypsies—more than in any country. There are large numbers of Bulgarians, Hungarians, Turks, Germans, Greeks, and Armenians. The Orthodox Greek Church is the state church and is professed by nearly all the Rumans. It is independent, the presiding body being a synod, at the head of which is the metropolitan primate of Bucharest. There are universities at Bucharest and Jassy. The largest cities are Bucharest, the capital (formerly the capital of Wallachia), Jassy (the old capital of Moldavia), and the two busy ports of Galatz and Braila.

The Rumans (or Wallachs) belong linguistically to the Romanic family of nations. They are a mixed race, the last of the Christian nations of Europe to make its appearance in history. The establishment of Roman colonies in Dacia and Mœsia gave rise to the development of a modern Romanic language isolated geographically from the other Romanic languages. Slavic and other foreign elements enter largely into the Ruman tongue. The Rumans themselves claim descent from the Roman colonists of Dacia, whence their name. An extensive national literature of recent growth exists. Little more than one-half of the Rumans dwell in Rumania. There are about 3,000,000 in Austria-Hungary (about nine-tenths of whom live in Transylvania and Hungary proper and the rest in Bukowina), perhaps one million in the Russian government of Bessarabia, and several hundred thousand in Servia, Macedonia, and Bulgaria. Those in the extreme S. are called Tsintsars.

The principality of Rumania came into existence in 1859–61 through the union of the principalities of Moldavia and Wallachia. These principalities make their appearance in history towards the close of the Middle Ages. They had barely attained a large extension and considerable power when they came in conflict with the Turkish invaders of southeastern Europe. There was a long period of vassalage to the Ottoman sultans (at times merely nominal or entirely interrupted), and finally from the seventeenth century the status of subject provinces. From the early part of the eighteenth century Moldavia and Wallachia were ruled by hospodars appointed by the sultan from among the noble Greek families called Fanariotes, who exploited the inhabitants to their own advantage. In 1777 Bukowina and in 1812 Bessarabia were severed from Moldavia. In 1829 Turkey was forced to concede to Russia a protectorate over Moldavia and Wallachia (the Danubian Principalities). Russia's efforts to become the controlling power in the principalities proved, however, abortive, and the Crimean War put an end to her activities in this direction. Its close was followed by the union of Moldavia and Wallachia under the sway of a native Ruman ruler, Prince Cuza, who was proclaimed as Alexander John I. in 1861. Rumania continued to pay tribute to the sultan. In 1866 Charles of Hohenzollern became prince. The Russo-Turkish War of 1877–78, in which the Rumans fought bravely on the side of Russia, brought about the complete independence of Rumania and the acquisition of the Dobrudja, which accession of territory, however, was purchased by the enforced retrocession to Russia of a strip of Bessarabia which that power had been forced to surrender at the close of the Crimean War. In 1881 Charles of Hohenzollern assumed the title of King of Rumania.

Rume'lia (Turk. Rumili, room'e-lee), a name applied to the eastern portion of the Turkish dominions in Europe, between Bulgaria on the N. and the Ægean Sea and the Sea of Marmora on the S., and extending from the Black Sea to the river Vardar. It thus includes Thrace and part of Macedonia. In a somewhat wider application of the name, Rumelia extends westward to the borders of Albania. The region between the crest of the Balkans and what is now Turkish Rumelia was constituted the principality of Eastern Rumelia (which see) in 1878. The name "Rumelia" signifies the "land of Rome," the city of Constantinople, when the Mohammedans came in contact with the Byzantine Empire, having appeared to them in the light of a new Rome and been designated as such. The sultanate of Iconium, in Asia Minor, which existed at the time of the Crusades, was called by the Mohammedans the sultanate of Rum. When the Ottoman Turks conquered the Balkan peninsula, the Christian subjects of the sultan in Europe came to be known to the Mohammedan world as Romans, and at the present day the Greeks are still designated as such by the Mohammedans. The name

Rumelia came to designate the principal part of the Turkish dominions in the Balkan Peninsula.

Russia, rŭsh'ą (Russ. Rossiya, ros-see'yå; Fr. Russie, rüs'see'; Ger. Russland, rōōs'lânt), formerly called Muscovy, a country of Europe, the dominant member of the Russian Empire. (See RUSSIAN EMPIRE.) The main-land extends from lat. 38° 20′ N., on the Caspian Sea, to 70° 10′ N., in Lapland, and from lon. 17° 40′ to 66° 30′ E., but the territories S. of the Manytch River (including the whole of Caucasia) and those E. of the Ural Mountains belong more properly to the continent of Asia. Giving it the broader extension, it is bounded N. by Norway and the Arctic Ocean; E. by Siberia (the frontier with which is largely constituted by the Ural Mountains), the Kirghiz country, and the Caspian Sea; S. by Persia, Asiatic Turkey, the Black Sea, and Austria-Hungary; and W. by Rumania, Austria-Hungary, Prussia, the Baltic Sea, and Sweden. Apart from the grand-duchy of Finland and the general government or lieutenancy of the Caucasus (Caucasia), it is divided into 60 governments, 10 of which are in Poland. Area of Russia (with Poland), 1,950,000 sq. m.; Finland, 144,000 sq. m.; and Caucasia 180,800 sq. m. Total, 2,274,800 sq. m. If, as is commonly done, the range of the Caucasus be regarded as constituting the boundary between Europe and Asia, then, deducting from the total here given the area of Transcaucasia (minus Daghestan and that part of the government of Baku which lies N. of the Caucasus), we shall have approximately for the area of the Russian dominions in Europe the figure of 2,200,000 sq. m.

Face of the Land.—The surface of Russia in Europe (not reckoning Caucasia) may be considered as one vast plain, partially enclosed by the Ural Mountains on the E., the Caucasus and the heights of the Crimea on the S., and the Carpathian foot-hills on the SW. Throughout its extent this plain is not broken by a single mountain. The Baltic provinces have a mean elevation of 1000 feet above the sea, while the general elevation of the land sinks to less than one-half of this height, sloping off peripherally to the N., NW., S., and SE. The west-central part of the country is occupied by the dome-shaped morass plateau of the Valdai Hills,—the water-parting between the principal river-systems of the land,—the average height of which is 800 to 900 ft. and the summit 1100 ft. above the sea; these sink rapidly to the SE., where they are lost in marshes. Russia is traversed by the largest rivers in Europe: the Baltic Sea receives the Kem, Uleå, Kumo, Neva, Narova, Düna, Niemen, and Vistula; the Arctic Ocean, the Pasvig, Kola, and Petchora; the White Sea, the Vig, Onega, Dvina, and Mezen; the Black Sea, the Dniester, Bug, Dnieper, Don (with its chief tributary, the Donets), and Kuban; and the Caspian Sea, the Ural, Volga, Kuma, and Terek. The Pruth and the Danube form the boundary on the side of Rumania and the Torneå flows on the border of Norway. The Volga (rising in the Valdai water-parting), with a length of upward of 2000 miles, which establishes by means of its intercommunicating waters direct navigation throughout the length and breadth of the country, is the largest river of Europe. (See VOLGA.) In the N. of Russia, especially in Finland, there are numerous lakes: the chief are Ladoga (the largest in Europe), Onega, Saima, Päijänne, Peipus, Ilmen, and Enara. The smaller lakes Bielo-Ozero, in the government of Novgorod, and Kubinskoye, in Vologda, are important for the internal navigation of the empire. The most valuable of the numerous salt lakes is Elton, in Saratov. Among the many islands belonging to the empire Nova Zembla (Novaya Zemlya), Vaigatch, and Kolguyev can properly be said to be a part of Russia in Europe. Geological phenomena warrant the conclusion that a great portion of central Russia was under the sea at a comparatively recent period. The loftiest elevations (outside of Caucasia) are found in the Ural Mountains, where a number of summits attain 5000 ft., the Telpös-is being 5500 ft. Roman-Kosh and Tchatyr-Dagh, in the Taurian Alps of the Crimea, both attain about 5000 ft.

Tundras, Steppes, etc.—The soil comprises every variety. There is an immense area of the finest agricultural land and there are great stretches unfit for cultivation. The vast region of the tundras, extending from lat. 64° N.

to the N. coast, is a swamp in summer and is covered with ice for nine months in the year; it produces chiefly moss, but in some places grasses grow luxuriantly. SW. of this the country, over a vast extent, is covered with forests of pine, larch, birch, and other trees, which afford valuable timber. In the SE. an immense grass and steppe region, partly of an uncovered desert type, extends between the Ural and the Volga and to the SW. of the lower course of the latter river; a portion of it affords tolerable pasturage. E. of lon. 45° E. a series of salt lakes occupy a depressed area, which once formed a portion of the Caspian Sea, the surface of which is now about 83 feet below that of the Mediterranean. This steppe is exposed to the greatest extremes of temperature; in winter the thermometer is frequently 15° and sometimes 35° below zero, while in summer the heat is often upward of 100°. The region of central Russia, in the upper basin of the Volga, is the most fertile in the empire. In the S., in the basins of the Dnieper and Don, reaching down to the Black Sea, is the great region of the grass steppes, in portions of which the soil, as in central Russia, consists of fertile black earth.

Climate.—From its vast extent, Russia has a great diversity of climate. The plains of the N., exposed to the winds of the Arctic Ocean, are much colder than the other countries of Europe in corresponding latitudes. In nearly the whole of the northern region, between lat. 66° N. on the White Sea and 62°, the soil is frozen throughout the year nearly to the surface, the temperature descending to —40° and —50°. The summer heat, although of short duration, is frequently intense. Between this frozen zone and lat. 58° N. the mean annual temperature varies from 32° to 40°; at St. Petersburg, which is within this zone, the thermometer in December and January sinks to more than 20° below zero, while in summer it rises to 85° or 90°. S. of lat. 58° the mean temperature is between 40° and 55°; the winters are severe and the summers hot. In parts of the steppe region and in the Crimea the summer heat is almost of torrid intensity. The mean July temperature of Odessa is 74°. In the Baltic provinces the climate is more temperate than in the interior. In the interior SSE. and S. winds prevail, while W. and NW. winds are most common on the coasts. The rainfall over a great part of Russia is small. The precipitation is most abundant in the Baltic provinces, where the average annual amount is 15 to 20 inches. The amount and frequency decrease in proceeding from W. to E., and during the long summer of the southern provinces rain very seldom falls. Snow falls early in winter and covers the ground to a great depth.

Vegetable Resources, Live-stock.—Russia produces all the plants common to the other countries of Europe. Agriculture is still largely in a rude state. The area under crops in 1903 was nearly 210,000,000 acres and the portion covered by forest about 550,000,000 acres, the greater part of which is owned by the state. Rye is the chief cereal crop and is very widely grown; the cultivation of barley extends to lat. 67° and that of oats to 62° N.; wheat is grown chiefly in southern Russia. Next to the United States, Russia is the leading wheat-exporting country in the world. The portion of the basin of the Volga included in the governments of Nizhni-Novgorod, Penza, Kazan, and Simbirsk is called the granary of Russia. Hemp and flax are grown chiefly on the upper Volga (to a considerable extent also in Poland); tobacco is cultivated principally in the Ukraine and in Transcaucasia; grapes are grown in the Crimea, in Transcaucasia, and on the lower courses of the Don and Volga; tea is cultivated with success in the Crimea and in Transcaucasia. The forests yield valuable produce, and building-timber, tar, pitch, and potash are widely exported. Cattle and sheep are extensively reared, and tallow and hides are exported in great quantities. Fine breeds of horses are raised. Camels are bred by the Tartars on the steppes and in the Crimea.

Fauna.—The fauna of European Russia is essentially that of the greater part of Europe, comprising Mediterranean and Arctic types as well as the general temperate forms. A number of Asiatic forms (saiga antelope, jackal) enter in the SE. The bison-like aurochs is found near the sources of the Narev and in restricted parts of the Caucasus; the reindeer is confined to the region N. of lat. 66° N.; the elk, boar, deer, and hare are found in the forested tracts, principally of the N.; and the fur-bearing animals are actively hunted. The wolf, fox, glutton, bear, and other carnivores are numerous. In addition to the birds common to other countries of Europe, the capercailzie is found in the N., the pelican in the S., on the shores of the Black and Caspian seas, and the bustard in the steppe region; geese and ducks abound in the lakes. Fish is plentiful in the rivers, especially in the Volga and the Ural, and in the White Sea, the Caspian Sea, and the Sea of Azov. Astrakhan is noted as a great seat of the sturgeon-fishery. The whale, seal, and Polar bear are extensively hunted in or about the Arctic waters.

Mineral Resources.—The mineral resources of Russia are very important, but apart from iron, coal, and naphtha the product is limited almost entirely to the region of the Ural Mountains and the Caucasus. The minerals or metals exploited are gold, platinum, silver (in limited quantity), copper, lead, manganese (Transcaucasia), mercury, zinc (Poland), sulphur (Caucasia and Poland), and cobalt. The output of coal in all the coal-fields in 1903 was 17,240,000 tons, of which the Donets coal-field furnished about 12,000,000 tons and Poland (Dombrowa), 4,500,000 tons. The chief naphtha deposits are those of the Baku region, the richest in the world, but mineral oil is also obtained at localities in the governments of Archangel and Samara, and in Kielce, Poland. Large quantities of salt are obtained from deposits of rock-salt and from numerous salines. Many forms of precious stones—among them the diamond, emerald, and topaz—are found in the Ural Mountains.

Manufactures and Commerce.—Since the time of Peter the Great, the progress of manufactures has been very rapid, and the improvement of their products has been commensurate with it. The staple manufactures are woollens, silks, linens, cottons, metal wares, soap, tobacco, liquors, beet-sugar, and candles; besides which there are manufactures of glass, paper, porcelain, arms, jewelry, and morocco leather. The cotton-industry has been especially developed during recent years and, together with the woollen industry, has an important seat in Poland. The number of people employed in the textile industries was in 1902, 708,186; in the manufacture and exploitation of metals, about 750,000; and in the preparation of articles of food, 303,213. The production of alcohol in the Russian Empire in 1904 was 86,756,217 gallons, the product of 2370 distilleries, nearly all of which were in European Russia. The sugar-industry is of great importance, the quantity of refined sugar produced in 1902–03 having been 1,180,293 tons. There are in the empire nearly 500,000 tobacco plantations. The commerce of Russia is greatly facilitated by its numerous navigable rivers and its vast and excellent system of canals, by means of which not only do the Baltic and the White seas communicate with the Caspian and the Black seas, but the great lakes and the principal rivers are united into a complete system of inland navigation. There are 17,000 miles of internal navigable waters. The length of completed railroads in Russia in 1904 was 31,299 miles. A line extends through Siberia to the Pacific Ocean. Moscow is the centre of internal commerce. The chief seaports are St. Petersburg, Cronstadt, and Riga on the Baltic, Archangel on the White Sea, Astrakhan on the Caspian Sea, and Odessa on the Black Sea. The chief exports comprise grain, flour, flax, hemp, timber and wooden manufactures, seeds, tallow, eggs, dairy produce, furs, leather, wool, tar, bristles, textiles, isinglass, bones, oil-cake, metals and metal goods, sugar, naphtha and naphtha oils, etc. Among the imports across the Asiatic frontier are tea, raw cotton, and rice. The fair of Nizhni-Novgorod is still an important factor in the interchange of Russian and Asiatic commodities, the value of the business transacted having diminished but little as the result of the opening up of more direct communication between distant points or of the introduction of more advanced mercantile methods.

Government, etc.—The government of Russia is an absolute hereditary monarchy. All power emanates from the emperor (or czar), who is the head of the Greek Church in Russia, officially styled the Orthodox Catholic faith. All rank is based on the tenure of civil or military office. The nobility are a privileged class; they have great political power and possess more than half of all the cultivated land in the country. Education is still in a backward state, although it has materially advanced during late years. There are universities at Moscow (with 4344 students in 1902), St. Petersburg (3835 students in 1904), Kiev, Kharkov, Dorpat (Yuriev), Warsaw, Kazan, Odessa, and Helsingfors. Technical, law, medical, and theological schools are found in some of the larger cities. The Russians are preeminently a nation of peasants and of dwellers in small towns. Previous to the reign of Alexander II. the bulk of the peasantry were serfs. On March 3, 1861, an imperial decree was passed declaring the emancipation of the serfs throughout the empire. Most of the land of the peasantry is not owned by individuals, but is held in common by the mir, or people of the commune in which it is situated, a redistribution of the land among the households composing the mir being made at intervals of a number of years. Part of the land is kept reserved for common purposes. The existence of the mir as a political unit secures to the Russian peasantry the enjoyment of local self-government in a remarkable degree considering the autocratic form of rule in the empire. The seat of government since the beginning of the eighteenth century has been St. Petersburg, but Moscow, the former capital, has remained the focus of the national life of the Russian people.

Population.—The main political subdivisions of the Russiam Empire are the governments, replaced in the newer parts of the empire by military districts or provinces (territories).

The following table exhibits the population of Russia (Russia proper, Poland, Finland, Caucasia), according to the census of 1897:

The total population in 1897 of Russia in Europe, not reckoning any part of the Caucasus, was 106,264,136. The population in 1902 was estimated at 115,500,000. It is now (1905) approximately 120,000,000, the annual excess of births over deaths being about 2,000,000. It consists mainly of Russians, Poles, Lithuanians, Letts, Jews, Finns and other Finnic peoples, Tartars, and Germans. (For a list of the nationalities in the whole empire, see Russian Empire). About three-fourths of the inhabitants of European Russia are Russians, who comprise about three-fourths of the whole Slavic race. The Russians are divided into Great Russians, Little Russians, and White Russians. More than two-thirds are Great Russians, who comprise nearly all the inhabitants of the central governments and constitute the bulk of the population in the N. (exclusive of Finland) and the E. The Little Russians are about one-third as numerous as the Great Russians. They dwell mainly in the governments of Kiev, Kharkov, Poltava, and Tchernigov, in the SW. (Little Russia or Malo-Russia). Their dialect differs from the speech of the Great Russians and is spoken by the Ruthenians in Austria-Hungary. The White Russians number about 5,000,000, the bulk of them living in Lithuania. The Russians constitute about one-fourth of the population of Asiatic Russia (including Caucasia). The whole body of the Russians belong to the Greek Church, but there are millions of dissenters within the church called Raskolniks. The Poles in Russia number about 8,000,000. They are Roman Catholics, as are also the bulk of the Lithuanians, whose territory, down to the latter part of the eighteenth century, formed part of the old kingdom of Poland. The Germans, who number about 2,000,000, live mainly in the Baltic Provinces (where they constitute the educated class), Poland, and southern Russia. They are Protestants. The Jews, who number about 5,000,000, are crowded together in the cities and towns of Poland, Lithuania, and the SW. part of Russia proper. They are compelled to live within a specified pale, and, while unhindered in their religious observances, they are treated as a down-trodden race. The Finns proper, who inhabit the NW. corner of European Russia (Finland), were until the beginning of the nineteenth century subjects of Sweden, and are Protestants. There are a number of Finnic tribes scattered over a large area in the N. and E. Their Russification is progressing steadily. The Rumans (Moldavians) inhabit Bessarabia. The Tartars dwell in the E. and S. The Cossacks, who live to a great extent under a military organization, are a people of uncertain origin. Their principal habitat is the province known as the Territory of the Don Cossacks, on both sides of the lower Don, and they are numerous on the eastern border. They speak the Little Russian dialect. See table of religions under Russian Empire.

The following 16 cities had a population of more than 100,000 in 1897: St. Petersburg, Moscow, Warsaw (the capital of Poland), Odessa, Lodz (the Polish Manchester), Riga, Kiev, Kharkov, Vilna, Saratov, Kazan, Yekaterinoslav, Rostov (on the Don), Astrakhan, Tula, and Kishinev.

Russia in Asia embraces Siberia and Central Asia (including the Khirgiz Steppes, Turkestan, and the Transcaspian Province), and, in addition to this, the whole or the southern half of Caucasia (according to whether we take the Manytch depression or the crest of the Caucasus as the dividing line between Europe and Asia) may properly be regarded as belonging to it. See Russian Empire, Siberia, Turkestan, Central Asia, etc.

History.—The foundation of the Russian Empire was laid at Novgorod about 862 by the Rus, or Varangians, a body of Scandinavians (Northmen), led by Rurik, whose descendants ruled for over 700 years. Kiev, wrested by the Northmen from the Khazars, soon became the seat of dominion. The Northmen were gradually absorbed into the body of the Slavic Russians. The grand-prince Vladimir the Great embraced Christianity in 988. In the following century the country was partitioned into various principalities. In the twelfth century the grand-principality of Vladimir (Susdal) became the chief seat of power, having supplanted Kiev. About this time Novgorod rose to be a flourishing state. In the first half of the thirteenth century the Mongols poured into Russia, and in 1240 the Russian princes had to do homage to the Mongol khan. Early in the fourteenth century large territories (Volhynia, Kiev, etc.) became the prey of the Lithuanians. About this time Moscow became the leading principality among the Russian states, still groaning under Mongol domination. In 1478 she annexed the republic of Novgorod, and two years later shook off the Mongol yoke. Russia soon after became the realm of Moscow (Muscovy). In the middle of the sixteenth century the Russians conquered the Tartar khanates of Kazan and Astrakhan, and a little later the conquest of Siberia was begun. The Russian dominion in this region spread with extraordinary rapidity. In 1613 the Romanoff dynasty mounted the throne, which it still occupies. In the seventeenth century Smolensk, the Ukraine, and Kiev were wrested from Poland. At the close of that century and in the early years of the next Peter the Great introduced reforms of every kind in Russia and brought it forward into the body politic of Europe. He made Russia a power on the Baltic, and founded St. Petersburg as the new capital in 1703. Catharine II. seized the greater part of the Polish dominions (1772, 1793, 1795), incorporated the Crimea in the empire, extended its frontiers to the Dniester on the side of Turkey, and annexed Courland. In the first half of the nineteenth century the region of the Caucasus, Finland, and Persian Armenia were conquered and the frontier on the side of Turkey was pushed to the Pruth. In 1815 the new kingdom of Poland was erected for the Russian dynasty. The Amur country was acquired in 1858. In 1867 Alaska was sold to the United States. Samarkand was annexed in 1868, Khokand in 1876, a large part of Turkish Armenia in 1878, and Merv in 1884. In 1898, by an agreement with China, Russia obtained a foothold at the extremity of the Liao-tung peninsula (the southern projection of Manchuria), where Port Arthur was converted into an almost impregnable naval station, while a great commercial port was created at Dalny, the two places being made termini of a branch of the Transsiberian railway. The convulsions attending the Boxer movement in China in 1900 gave the Russians an opportunity to occupy Manchuria. Their advance in this direction brought on in 1904 a disastrous war with Japan. The Japanese took Dalny, forced Port Arthur to surrender (Jan., 1905), drove the enemy from Mukden, and destroyed the Russian naval power. Conformably to a treaty of peace negotiated, under the mediation of President Roosevelt, at Portsmouth, N.H., and signed Sept. 5, 1905, Russia withdrew from Manchuria, allowed Japan to retain Port Arthur, ceded half of Saghalin to Japan, and gave the Japanese a free hand in Korea.

Russian Empire, an empire in Europe and Asia, the largest state in the world next to the British empire. It embraces about one-sixth of the earth's surface,—more than one-half of Europe and more than one-third of Asia. The following is a table of the main divisions of the empire.

Divisions.	Area in sq. m.	Pop. in 1897.
Russia proper (without Poland and Finland)	1,902,000	94,215,415
Poland	49,000	9,455,943
Finland	144,000	2,592,778
Caucasus (Caucasia)	181,000	9,248,695
Central Asia	1,549,000	7,721,684
Siberia	4,820,000	5,727,090
Total	8,645,000	128,961,605

The population of the Russian empire was estimated in 1902 at 140,576,000. The excess of births over deaths being more than 2,000,000 a year, the number of inhabitants may now (1905) be put at about 147,000,000. The nationalities (omitting a number of minor ones) comprised in the Russian Empire are as follows. The figures of the population for 1900 are given in round numbers:

Russians	95,000,000
Poles	8,000,000
Bulgarians	200,000
Lithuanians	2,500,000
Letts	1,000,000
Germans	2,000,000
Swedes	300,000
Rumans	1,000,000
Armenians	1,000,000
Ossetes, Tajiks, Kurds, Persians, and Gypsies	400,000
Georgians, Mingrelians, Lesghians, and other mountain tribes of the Caucasus	2,500,000
Jews	5,000,000
Finns and Karelians	2,500,000
Other Finno-Ugric peoples: Esths, Lapps, Mordvins, Tcheremisses, Votyaks, Permiaks, Zyrians, Ostyaks, Voguls, Samoyeds, etc.	2,500,000
Tchuvashes (mixed Finnic-Tartar stock?)	500,000
Turco-Tartaric peoples: Tartars, Bashkirs, Uzbegs, Kirghizes (Kazaks), Kara-Kirghizes, Turkomans, Yakuts, etc.	8,000,000
Kalmucks, Buriats, Tunguses	500,000

The religions in 1897 were represented as follows:

Orthodox Greeks	89,606,000
Roman Catholics	11,420,000
Protestants	6,213,000
Other Christians	1,225,000
Jews	5,200,000
Mohammedans	13,890,000

Also many Buddhists. See RUSSIA.

Russian River, Cal., rises in the Coast Range and enters the Pacific Ocean about 30 miles W. of Santa Rosa. Length, about 125 miles.

Russian Turkestan. See TURKESTAN.

Russiaville, a banking post-village of Howard co., Ind., on the Toledo, St. Louis and Western R., 9 miles SW. of Kokomo. Pop. in 1890, 603.

Russikon, roos'sẹ-kọn, a village of Switzerland, canton and 5 miles S. of Zürich.

Russniaks. See RUTHENIANS.

Rust, a town of Hungary. See RUSZT.

Rustburg (formerly Campbell Court-House), a post-village, capital of Campbell co., Va., on the Norfolk and Western R., 13 miles S. of Lynchburg. Pop. about 350.

Rustchuk, rŏŏs'chŏŏk, or more properly Rushtchuk (Bulg. Russe, roo-sä'), a town of Bulgaria, on the Danube, at the influx of the river Lom, opposite the Rumanian town of Giurgevo, 139 miles by rail NW. of Varna. The numerous mosques, now slimly attended, constitute the chief architectural feature of the place. Rustchuk has a large trade and manufactures of pottery, tobacco, etc. It is the seat of a Bulgarian and an Armenian bishop. It was an important fortress under the Turks, figuring in the Russian wars. Pop. in 1900, 32,661, comprising Bulgarians, Turks, Rumans, Jews, Greeks, and Armenians.

Saghalin, sâ-gâ-lin' (more properly Sakhalin), or Tarrakai, tâ-râ-kī', a long and narrow island off the E. coast of Asia (Primorskaya), between lat. 46° 10′ and 54° 30′ N. and lon. 141° 50′ and 144° 45′ E., separated from the main-land by the Gulf of Tartary (or Saghalin), and S. from Yezo by La Pérouse Strait. It is 570 miles long and from 17 to 90 miles across. Area, estimated at about 29,400 sq. m. The surface is mountainous, rising in the peak of Tiara to 5000 feet, and is largely forest-clad, with some prairie-land and pastures. The climate is very severe in winter and raw in summer. The grains are but little cultivated. Many fur-bearing animals abound. Lignitic coal of good quality occurs in large deposits. Pop. in 1897, 28,113, of whom nearly one-half were convicts or banished offenders. The island was officially Russian until September, 1905. By the terms of the treaty of Portsmouth, N.H., the southern half was ceded to Japan.

Saghalin-Ula, a town of Manchuria. See AIGUN.

Sag Harbor, a banking post-village and port of entry of Suffolk co., N.Y., on Gardiner's Bay, an inlet of the Atlantic Ocean, 100 miles E. by N. of New York, on the Long Island R. It has a good harbor, many stately residences, the Academy of the Sacred Heart, and manufactures of silver-ware, watch-cases, bricks, carriages, and cigars. It was at one time an important whaling-port. Pop. in 1900, 1969.

Sag'inaw, a small river of Michigan, is formed by the Flint and Shiawassee rivers, which unite in Saginaw co., about 10 miles SW. of East Saginaw. It enters Saginaw Bay about 5 miles below Bay City. Steamboats ascend the river to Saginaw.

Saginaw, a county of Michigan, is near the middle of the lower peninsula. Area, 832 sq. m. Its chief rivers are the Saginaw, which intersects the northern part, and its branches the Flint and Shiawassee rivers, which unite near the middle of the county. It is also drained by the Cass and Tittabawassee rivers, which enter the Saginaw about 2 miles below the junction of the Flint with the other branch. Capital, Saginaw (Saginaw West Side). Pop. in 1890, 82,273; in 1900, 81,222.

Saginaw, or Saginaw West Side, a city, capital of Saginaw co., Mich., on the Saginaw River, at the head of navigation, 96 miles NW. of Detroit, on the Michigan Central, the Grand Trunk and the Pere Marquette Rs. Its site is a plateau elevated about 30 feet above the river, which is here crossed by several bridges. The city's important industries are represented by large railroad-shops, iron-, machine-, boiler- and plate-glass works, furniture-factories, breweries, and manufactories of gasoline-engines, automobiles, wooden-ware, brick, etc. Saginaw is the centre of the vast beet-sugar industry of the state and is also extensively engaged in coal-mining, lumbering, and salt-production. Vessels drawing 10 feet of water can ascend the river to this place. The city has several prominent educational institutions (St. Andrews Academy, Saginaw Valley Medical College), the Germania Institute, Hoyt Library, etc. Pop. in 1890, 46,322; in 1900, 42,345.

Sagua la Grande, a river on the N. coast of Cuba. It rises in the mountains S. of Sagua la Grande and flows E. and N., emptying E. of La Isabela. It is navigable for about 20 miles. The river Sagua la Chica discharges about 25 miles ESE. of the mouth of the Sagua la Grande.

Sagua la Grande, så'gwå lå grån'då, a city of Santa Clara province, Cuba, 32 miles by rail and highway N. by W. of Santa Clara. It is on the Sagua la Grande River and is connected by rail with Cienfuegos and Havana, and with La Isabela, its port, on the N. coast, a few miles distant. The streets are wide. It has a fine church, private and municipal schools, theatres, casinos, a hospital, town-hall, boards of education and health, machine-shops, and lumber-yards. Local railroads run to plantations in the vicinity. It exports sugar. Pop. in 1899, 12,728.

Saguenay, sag-ạ-nå', a river of Quebec and one of the principal tributaries of the St. Lawrence, the estuary of which it enters 120 miles NE. of Quebec, in lat. 48° 6′ N., lon. 69° 38′ W., and into which it brings the surplus waters of Lake St. John. Length of the course below Lake St. John, about 110 miles. It leaves the lake by what is known as the Great and Little Discharges, which are separated from one another by Alma Island. The true source of the river is one of the long streams (Peribonka, Mistassini, Ashuapmouchouan) which are tributary to Lake St. John. The Saguenay is remarkable for its wild and picturesque scenery. Its upper course runs through a wilderness of pine- and spruce-covered hills, abounds in water-falls, and is navigable only for canoes. A few miles below the village of Chicoutimi, where an extensive lumber-business is transacted, there recedes from the river a beautiful expanse of water called Ha Ha Bay. Between this bay and the mouth of the river its course exhibits some of the most sublime river-scenery in the world, the banks in places (Capes Trinity and Eternity) rising to 1500 and 1700 feet. The extraordinary depth of the lower channel (the bottom at the confluence with the St. Lawrence being about 600 ft. lower than that of the major stream) and the abrupt plunge of the banks have led some geologists to assume for the structure a seismic origin. During the summer months the Saguenay is visited by thousands of tourists. It is navigable to Ha Ha Bay for vessels of the largest class and to Chicoutimi for regular steamboats. It receives the waters of many tributaries. At the mouth of the river is Tadousac, a watering-place.

Saguenay, a county in the SE. part of Quebec. The St. Lawrence forms its SE. boundary and it is intersected by the Saguenay River. Capital, Tadousac.

Sagunto, så-goon'to, formerly Murviedro, moor-vẽå'dro (a name derived from the Latin, Muri Veteres,—i.e., "old walls;" anc. Sagun'tum), a fortified town of Spain, province and 14 miles NNE. of Valencia, 3 miles from the Mediterranean, picturesquely situated at the foot of a mountain. It has Roman and Moorish remains. The ancient Saguntum, which was a seaport (the sea has since receded), was an opulent city when Rome and Carthage first came in conflict. Its siege, capture, and destruction by Hannibal in 219 B.C. was the prelude to the second Punic War. The city was rebuilt by the Romans. Pop. in 1900, 6784.

Sagur, India. See Saugor.

Sahagún, så-å-goon', a town of Spain, province and 31 miles ESE. of León. Pop. (commune) about 3000.

Sahama, or Nevado de Sahama, nå-vå'do då så-å'må, or more accurately Sajama, a volcanic mountain of the Bolivian Andes, in the department of Oruro. Lat. about 18° 7′ S.; lon. 68° 52′ W. Height, about 21,000 feet.

Sahara, så-hå'rå, properly så'hạ-rå (Arab. så'h'rå), called the Great Desert, a vast region of northern Africa, with no very precise boundary-limitations, but lying mainly between the Atlantic Ocean on the W. and the valley of the Nile on the E., the Sudan on the S. and the Atlas Mountains and a portion of the Mediterranean Sea on the N. The greater portion of this vast region, whose greatest length exceeds 3000 miles and whose area probably covers not less than 2,000,000 sq. m., lies between lat. 12° 30′ and 30° N., and is in position about one-third extra-tropical. It is perhaps in greater part a table-land of moderate elevation, or a series of plateaus of different altitudes (500–2000 feet) with no clear relationships existing between them, and with irregular mountain-elevations or even chains, especially in the central portion, extending far into the region. Some of these mountain-elevations, as the Tarso (7800 ft.) in the region of Tibesti (about lat. 20° N.; lon. 18° 20′ E.), and Ilaman (6200 ft.) and Tahat in Ahaggar (about lat. 22° 30′; lon. 4° 40′ E.), are partially covered with snow during several weeks of the year. The deepest depression of the true Sahara is found in a region of schotts (Mreir, Jerid), lying W. of the Gulf of Gabes, where the surface descends to 60–70 ft. below sea-level. The surface of Lake Chad, on the borders of the Sudan, lies at an altitude of about 830 ft. A considerable portion of the Sahara presents strictly desert conditions, with vast areas, especially in the eastern (Libyan) and western (Moroccan) sections, having little or no vegetation, but elsewhere vegetation of a restricted number of types (artemisia, tamarisk, acacia) is present in greater or less quantity, especially along the wads or dry water-courses. Large numbers of oases or fertile spots, the "gardens of the desert," are irregularly scattered about, in places following in close succession, and in these there is even a profuse vegetation. The physiognomic type is the date-palm, which is sometimes numbered by 100,000–500,000. The fig, peach, grape, and a number of the south European fruits are cultivated. Throughout nearly the entire region there are no permanent water-courses (the Nile touches the E. border and the Niger traverses a part of the tract on the S.), but from time to time, as fed by the waters of the interior mountains and depending upon heavy rain-falls in the mountain-region, temporary and even tempestuous streams are developed, which, however, soon dry out or are absorbed by the desert-sands. The largest of such streams appear to be the two Igharghars, both descending from the heights of Ahaggar—one flowing northward into the depression of Mreir, and the other southwestward towards the Niger. Much water is distributed through the sands even in the highest superficial zone, and is frequently tapped in artesian and native wells at a depth of 30–70 feet.

As regards its surface aspect, two types of the Sahara are recognized: 1, the Hamada (or stony Sahara), where solid rock-masses, either as flattened or horizontally-placed plateaus, or as disturbed mountain fragments, constitute the dominating feature of the land; and 2, the Erg or Areg, the region of shifting sands and dunes, the latter not infrequently 300–500 feet in height, or even attaining 1000–1400 feet, as near the oasis of Tuggurt. Over large areas the sands are manifestly only degradational products derived from the rocks.

The climate of the Sahara is varied and presents extremes of diurnal as well as of seasonal temperatures. The daily summer temperature in the low-lying areas frequently rises to 115°–120°, or even higher, whereas in winter frosts are in some sections by no means exceptional. Even at times of extreme heat by day, freezing, resulting from extremely rapid radiation, may be a characteristic of the nightly period. At other times, however, the temperature of night may remain at 100°–105°. Storm-winds (simoom), suffocating through their high temperature and the sand which they carry with them, are a serious menace to travellers in the Saharan region. The exact conditions of the Saharan climate are not yet fully understood, nor is the meteorologist in a position to state in how far the present desert conditions represent the past history of the region. It would appear, however, from the discovery of the remains of many poplar trees, together with Roman remains, in the region of El-Outaia, N. of Biskra, that over a part of the Sahara, at least, desert conditions have become accentuated since the middle Roman period. The fauna of the Sahara is a restricted one, the deficiency of vegetation and water readily accounting for this condition. Of the most broadly distributed and more general animal types are the jackal, hyena, numerous antelopes or gazelles, jumping-mice or jerboas, lizards, and the horned or sand-viper. The lion and panther rarely penetrate far beyond the confines of the region, and there are comparatively few animal types of the true African fauna of the south and centre of the continent which reach northward. The Sahara, in fact, is a barrier to migration almost as pronounced as would be an arm of the sea. Regarding the geological history of the region much still remains to be determined, but there exists hardly a doubt, as is indicated by the fossil remains that have been found (1903–04) at Bilma, Dakar, Tamaske (250 miles W. of Zinder), and near Zinder itself, that as late as the Cretaceous and Tertiary ages of geological time a vast sea swept over the major portion of the region, and extended perhaps continuously to Beluchistan and British India. The Sahara has yielded some metals, but its principal product is salt, which is obtained in large quantities at Bilma, Taudeny, and elsewhere.

A number of well marked-out caravan routes traverse the interior of the region and supply avenues of commercial enterprise. Among the more important of these are the routes (from Fez or the city of Morocco; from Gardaia and Ouargla, in Algeria; from Ghadames and Murzuk in Tripoli) having Timbuktu and other places in the Niger region, or the Sudan territory about Lake Chad, for objective points. Various lines of railway have been projected to penetrate into the interior, but so far,—largely as the result of the enmity to foreigners shown by some of the interior roving tribes, more particularly the Tuaregs,—comparatively little has been accomplished. The line seemingly having the greatest promise is the one projected to unite the city of Algiers with the great bend of the Niger (passing Laghouat and Gardaia).

Saint John, a city and seaport of New Brunswick, the commercial metropolis of the province, and capital of the co. of St. John, is picturesquely situated at the mouth of the St. John River, on a rocky peninsula projecting into the harbor, 190 miles NW. of Halifax, on the Intercolonial, the Canadian Pacific, and the New Brunswick Southern Rs. Lat. 45° 14′ N.; lon. 66° 3′ W. The city is regularly laid out and has a number of substantial buildings,—St. Mary's cathedral (Roman Catholic), Trinity Church, provincial insane asylum, city hospital, court-house and jail, marine hospital, penitentiary, custom house, almshouse, Wiggins's and state orphan asylums, sailors' home, public library, masonic temple, mechanics' institute, and academy of music. The chief business street is King Street, which leads off from King Square, near the centre of the city. Portland and Carleton are now included within the city limits. The harbor of St. John is capacious, safe, and never obstructed by ice, being the only harbor of the Atlantic coast N. of Baltimore that enjoys this condition. Its entrance is protected by Partridge Island, on which are a quarantine hospital and a light-house. The entrance of the river St. John into the harbor, about 1½ miles above the city, is through a narrow, rocky gorge, in which the rise of the tide is 17–20 feet, and where, at low-water, there is a fall in the direction of the sea of 12–15 ft. The river is spanned by railway and suspension bridges. St. John is the entrepôt of a wide extent of country abounding in agricultural resources, minerals, and valuable timber. It has manufactories of iron castings, steam-engines, machinery, edge-tools, cotton and woollen goods, boots and shoes, leather, wooden-ware, soap and candles, carriages, car-springs, agricultural implements, lumber, paper, sugar-boxes, etc., but its most important branches of industry are ship-building and the shipping of lumber. Several hundred men are yearly engaged in the fisheries in the harbor of St. John. Salmon, shad, herrings, alewives, halibut, and haddock are taken in large quantities. St. John was created a town by royal charter in 1785. The city has several times been visited by ravaging fires, the most destructive having been that of June 20, 1877, which destroyed property to the value of nearly $30,000,000. Pop. of the city in 1891, 39,179; in 1901, 40,711.

Saint Lawrence (Fr. Saint-Laurent, sănˢ lōˈrònˢʹ), one of the largest rivers of North America, the outlet of the Great Lakes, issues from Lake Ontario, through what is known as the Lake of the Thousand Islands, in about lat. 44° 10′ N. and lon. 76° 30′ W., and, flowing in a NE. direction, forming in a part of its course the boundary between New York and Canada, falls into the Gulf of St. Lawrence, by an estuary 90 miles across, in about lat. 49° 30′ N. and lon. 64° W. Viewing this river in connection with the Great Lakes, it may be said to rise at the sources of the St. Louis, which flows into Lake Superior a few miles SW. of Duluth. The stream, taken in this broadest extension, has received different names in different parts of its course: between lakes Superior and Huron it is called the St. Mary's; between lakes Huron and Erie, the St. Clair and Detroit; between lakes Erie and Ontario, the Niagara; between Lake Ontario and the sea it is the St. Lawrence proper. Its full length, including the chain of lakes, is estimated at 2100–2200 miles. Many geographers place the true mouth of the St. Lawrence (increasing the extent of the Gulf of St. Lawrence) between Pointe des Monts and Cape Chatte, which is at a distance in a direct line of 550 miles from Lake Ontario. The St. Lawrence discharges a greater quantity of water than any river of the globe excepting the Amazon, and it drains the largest association of freshwater lakes. Its general width is 1–3 miles, expanding in Lake St. Peter to about 7 miles, and below Quebec, or the island of Orleans, rapidly broadening to 10 miles. In its lower course it reaches a width of 30–40 miles. The river is navigable for large ocean vessels to Montreal. Between Montreal and Lake Ontario the navigation is considerably impeded by rapids, the most important of which are Cedar, Coteau, the Cascades, and the Lachine, the latter 9 miles above Montreal. This is overcome by the canals, which have an aggregate length of 42 miles, river steamers being enabled to ascend all the way to the lake. Steamers pass through the rapids on descending the river. The total fall from Lake Ontario to the Gulf is 247 feet. Tide-water ascends to Three Rivers, about half way between Quebec and Montreal. The depth of water at or near Quebec reaches 100 ft. and the sunken estuary has the extraordinary depth of 1200 ft. By means of the Richelieu (or St. John) River and Chambly Canal, large vessels pass from the St. Lawrence to Lake Champlain, which communicates through canal with the navigable waters of the Hudson. The principal affluents of the St. Lawrence are the Ottawa, the St. Maurice, Batiscan, Richelieu, St. Francis, Chaudière, and Saguenay. The St. Lawrence, with its tributaries, drains an area probably not much exceeding 500,000 sq. m. The navigation of the river, owing to ice, is usually suspended for 4–5 months. In 1535–36 Jacques Cartier ascended the St. Lawrence River as far as the site of Montreal. See ONTARIO, ERIE, NIAGARA, etc.

Saint Louis, sęnt loo'is or loo'ee, the chief city of Missouri and the fourth in population of the cities of the United States, is situated on the W. bank of the Mississippi River, 20 miles below the mouth of the Missouri, 600 miles (direct) N. by W. of New Orleans, and 875 miles WSW. of New York. Lat. of observatory, 38° 38′ 3″ N.; lon. 90° 12′ 17″ W. The centre of one of the finest agricultural districts, with admirable facilities for water transportation and vast railroad systems, St. Louis possesses almost unrivalled business advantages. The Mississippi gives it direct communication with many thousands of miles of navigable water, and numerous great lines of railroad radiate from St. Louis as a centre and place it in communication with all sections of the country. Among the railroads of the St. Louis system are the St. Louis and San Francisco, the Missouri Pacific, the Missouri, Kansas and Texas, the Burlington Route, the Wabash, the Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago and St. Louis, the Vandalia Line, the Louisville and Nashville, the Mobile and Ohio, and the St. Louis, Iron Mountain and Southern. All of these lines, together with others hardly less important, now use the Union Station, a colossal structure erected in 1895 at a cost of $5,000,000 and giving accommodation to 32 tracks.

The city, whose major part lies at an elevation of 400–500 feet above the sea, is built on three terraces, the uppermost of which is about 200 ft. above the river surface. It is laid out on the rectangular plan, the streets running N. and S. being numbered serially from the river. The more important thoroughfares are Washington Avenue, devoted largely to wholesale trade interests, and Broadway (or Fifth) and Olive Streets, with the more attractive retail shops. The river-front is largely a levee, along which are lined the numerous steamers that are engaged in the navigation of the Mississippi River; although still at times bustling with life, it no longer shows that activity which was a feature of the city before the later days of railroad development. The magnificent Eads Bridge, which crosses the river at this point and permits the eastern railroads to enter directly into the city, consists of three steel spans, each of which is over 500 ft. in length, and is justly considered a masterpiece in bridge-building. It was constructed in 1869–74, and cost, with its vast tunnel, about $10,000,000. The Merchants' Bridge, designed exclusively for railroads, is 3 miles farther up the river, and was completed in 1890 at a cost of about $3,000,000. St. Louis has a most complete electrical and cable street-railway system.

Among the notable buildings and institutions of the city are the new city-hall (occupying a conspicuous position in Washington Park), the court-house, chamber of commerce, the custom-house and post-office, the Four Courts (an immense structure designed in pattern after the Louvre of Paris), museum of fine arts, and the coliseum, the last-named an enormous edifice designed for concerts, conventions, and expositions, and giving seating accommodation to 15,000 persons. Many of the business houses are massive architectural constructions. The Washington University is an important institution of learning, and has schools of art, science, engineering, law, and medicine. The attendance in 1904 (exclusive of the School of Fine Arts) was about 1900. The St. Louis University is a Roman Catholic institution. Among special schools the St. Louis Medical College occupies a high position. Other educational institutions are the Forest Park University for Women, Christian Brothers' College, Kenrick Theological Seminary, Missouri School for the Blind, Mercantile Library, and the public library, the last-named with (1905) nearly 200,000 volumes. The city has a large number of beautiful churches and hundreds of magnificent residences, St. Louis being essentially a city of homes. It has more than 2000 acres enclosed in public parks and pleasure-grounds, some of which are handsomely improved. The most beautiful spot in the city is Tower Grove Park, containing 276 acres, adjoining which is the Missouri Botanical Garden (or Shaw's Garden), which was bequeathed to the city by Henry Shaw and stands first in the rank of educational botanical gardens of the country. Forest Park, the largest park of the city, contains 1370 acres.

The mean annual temperature of St. Louis is 55.7°. The purest of water is secured from the Mississippi through the works at Bissel's Point, and a new system of water-works, located at Chain of Rocks, just below the mouth of the Missouri River, has lately been established.

St. Louis ranks fourth among the manufacturing cities of the United States, the value of its manufactured product in 1900 having been about $235,000,000. Chief among the articles manufactured are tobacco (the city being the largest tobacco mart in the world and turning out annually upward of 80,000,000 pounds of manufactured tobacco), malted liquors (upward of 20,000,000 gallons of beer per year), hardware, railroad-cars, street-cars, stoves, flour, clothing, boots and shoes, wooden-ware, sanitary-engineering supplies, drugs, biscuits, meat products, bricks, etc. The city is also the largest mule market in the world. In its central position at the junction of upward of 20 important lines of railway and commanding the navigation of the Mississippi River, St. Louis is a most important distributary for both manufactured articles and the produce of the soil, its shipments of cotton (upward of 700,000 bales per year), breadstuffs, live-stock, wool, metal products, coal, hides, etc., being very heavy. It is noted as a drug market.

St. Louis was settled in 1764, when Pierre Laclède Liguest established a trading-post for furs. The settlement was within the limits of Louisiana, which had just been ceded by France to Spain. The site remained in the hands of the French until some years later. The purchase by President Jefferson of Louisiana (which had been retroceded by Spain to France) brought St. Louis in 1803 within the dominions of the United States. It had then about 1000 inhabitants. In 1822, soon after the admission of Missouri into the Union, St. Louis was chartered as a city. In 1830 the population was 6694; in 1840, 16,469; in 1850, 77,850; in 1860, 160,773; in 1870, 310,864; in 1880, 350,518; in 1890, 451,770; in 1900, 575,238. The Louisiana Purchase Exposition (World's Fair) was held in the city in 1904.

Saint Lucia, sẹnt loo-see'ạ (Fr. Sainte-Lucie, sȧNt lü'see'), one of the British West India Islands, in the Windward group, lying between Martinique and St. Vincent. Lat. (N. point) 14° 5′ N.; lon. 60° 57′ W. Greatest length, from N. to S., 27 miles. Area, 233 sq. m. The island is of a volcanic nature, with rugged and largely precipitous slopes. Many of the heights have been at no very remote period active craters. In one of them, called Soufrière, volcanic agency is still attested by the sulphurous vapors rising from it. The greater part of the island is covered with dense forests; but the valleys and lower heights are well cultivated and remarkably productive. The staple products are sugar, rum, logwood, spices, and cacao. Coffee was formerly one of the staples. Native sulphur is found. The island has a local government, but forms part of the colony of the Windward Islands. The capital is Castries, with an excellent and now strongly fortified harbor. Pop. in 1902, 50,934.

Saint Lucie, sẹnt loo-see', a post-village of Brevard co., Fla., on the Indian River, nearly opposite Indian River Inlet, about 230 miles SSE. of Jacksonville. It is a place of winter-resort.

The city is substantially built, with prominent and imposing public edifices, and was one of the first cities to construct massive and lofty office-buildings of the modern style of architecture. Among the more notable public buildings are the new state capitol, the city-hall (erected at a cost of $1,000,000), post-office, Roman Catholic cathedral, and national guard armory. Among educational institutions are the agricultural college of the state university (at St. Anthony Park), Hamline University (Methodist, with about 500 students), Macalester College (Presbyterian), Concordia College, St. Paul's College, St. Paul's Seminary, the State Historical Library, and an academy of natural sciences. The most beautiful of the residence streets is Summit Avenue. St. Paul has an active wholesale distributing trade and important manufactures, the leading manufactured articles being boots and shoes, clothing, furs, farming implements, and malted liquors. The city has also large railroad repair-shops, foundries, and general machine-shops. The value of the manufactured product in 1900 was upward of $38,000,000. The average duration of the season of navigation is about 7 months. St. Paul was settled in 1838 and was chartered as a city in 1854. Pop. in 1860, 10,401; in 1870, 20,030; in 1875, 36,383; in 1880, 41,473; in 1890, 133,156; in 1900, 163,065.

Saint Petersburg (Russ. Sankt Peterburg, sănkt pyĕt'ẹr-bŏŏrg'), a government of European Russia, having on the N. the Gulf of Finland and Lake Ladoga and on the W. Lake Peipus and the river Narova. Area, exclusive of lakes, 17,250 sq. m.; inclusive of the water-surface, 20,760 sq. m. Surface low and level and in part marshy. Nearly half is covered with forest. The region is well watered. The principal rivers, in addition to the Narova, are the Volkhov, entering Lake Ladoga, and the Neva, connecting Lake Ladoga with the Gulf of Finland. There is an extensive system of canals. Market-gardening and dairying are the principal branches of rural industry. The fisheries are important and much lumber is exported. Pop. in 1897, 2,107,691. A considerable fraction of the rural inhabitants belong to the Finnish race.

Saint Petersburg, the capital of the Russian Empire and of the government of St. Petersburg, situated on the Neva, the outlet of Lake Ladoga, where that river enters the E. end of the Gulf of Finland, 400 miles NW. of Moscow. Lat. of the observatory 59° 56′ 32″ N.; lon. 30° 17′ 51″ E. The Neva here divides into a number of arms, forming a delta, which is embraced within the city limits. There are 4 main arms, the Great and Little Neva and the Great and Little Nevka. The largest of the delta islands is the Vassili Ostrov (Basil Island), between the Great Neva on the S. and the Little Neva on the N. The next largest is that formed by the Great and Little Neva and the Great and Little Nevka. This is subdivided by narrow waterways into 4 islands,—the Petersburg, Apothecary's, and Petrovsky islands, and the islet on which is the fortress of Peter and Paul. The main portion of St. Petersburg is on the main-land, occupying a peninsula washed on the E. by the Neva and on the NW. by the Great Neva. The Vassili Ostrov contains the most important insular section of the city. The islands with their gardens and villas are a charming feature of the capital. The various parts of the city are connected by about 120 bridges, most of them spanning narrow canals, the longest, the new Troitsky Bridge, being a little more than one-third of a mile in length. St. Petersburg was built on a swamp. The land has been laboriously reclaimed and is still subject to overflow by the Neva. The water-front is lined with massive granite quays. The city has a circuit of about 30 miles and an area of about 35 sq. m.

St. Petersburg is the administrative head-quarters of the Russian Empire and the seat of autocracy, but it yields to Moscow the distinction of being regarded as the focus of the national life of the Russian people. The city has a modern appearance, having just completed the second century of its existence. It is regularly laid out, with streets of generous width. It contains within a comparatively small area an extraordinary collection of edifices impressive by the beauty of their architecture or their great extent, and of imposing sculptural monuments. The quarters removed from the heart of the city present, however, in great part a dreary expanse of uninteresting streets, whose monotony is broken here and there by an open square or a stately edifice. Whole sections have little to show but a vast agglomeration of low wooden dwellings. The principal section of the city is included between the Great Neva and the curving canal called the Fontanka, a waterway about 50 yards in width. This is divided into 4 quarters, the principal of which is the Admiralty Quarter, extending along the Great Neva. It takes its name from the Admiralty building, a structure dating from the earliest period of the city's history. This edifice, the seat of the ministry of the marine and containing the marine museum, has a length of nearly 1600 feet. It faces the attractive Alexander Gardens on the SE. On the SW. is the Peter Square, containing the famous colossal equestrian statue of Peter the Great, designed by Falconet, who was commissioned to execute the work by Catharine II. The pedestal is a block of granite about 15 yards long and 5 yards high, weighing 1000 tons or more, which had to be transported a distance of several miles. Beyond the Peter Square are the buildings of the Senate and Holy Synod. A short distance from the SW. corner of the Admiralty is the cathedral of St. Isaac, the most magnificent ecclesiastical structure of St. Petersburg, erected in the first half of the nineteenth century. With its porticos, whose columns are monoliths of polished red granite over 50 ft. high, and its huge gilded dome, it presents an appearance hardly surpassed by that of any modern edifice. The splendor of the interior corresponds to the external effect. To the NE. of the Admiralty there is an array of palaces extending along the river front. The one nearest to the Admiralty is the famous Winter Palace, a vast pile, facing the Neva on one side and the Palace Square on the other. This building, the imperial winter residence, is the work of three empresses,—Anna, Elizabeth, and Catharine II. It contains a bewildering assemblage of sumptuous apartments adorned with innumerable works of painting and sculpture. In one of these apartments are the imperial regalia and crown jewels, unsurpassed for their wealth of precious stones. Adjoining the Winter Palace is the Hermitage, dating in part from the reign of Catharine II., but mainly the work of Nicholas I. It contains one of the leading museums of painting in the world, and splendid collections of Greek and Roman sculptures, Greek antiquities, and objects of art, vases, coins, etc. At the end of this series of stately edifices is the so-called Marble Palace erected by Catharine II. The Palace Square, SE. of the Winter Palace, contains the Alexander Column, erected to the memory of Alexander I., the largest monolithic monument of modern times, the columnal part having a height of nearly 100 ft. On the SE. side of the square is the imposing building of the General Staff.

From the Alexander Garden, in front of the Admiralty, the Nevsky Prospekt, the principal thoroughfare of St. Petersburg, extends in an easterly direction. It is a broad and stately boulevard, one of the handsomest avenues in Europe, lined in part with elegant shops, where the life of the capital reveals itself in its most animated and picturesque aspect. Among the prominent objects on the line of the Nevsky Prospekt, or in close proximity to it, are the magnificent Kazan Cathedral (early part of nineteenth century), having in front a great semicircular colonnade of Corinthian columns; the Duma (or city-hall); the Gostiny Dvor, a vast pile of buildings, whose arcades are lined with shops; the imperial library; the monument to Catharine II. (on the Alexandra Square), the fine Alexandra Theatre, the Anitchkoff Palace, and the Anitchkoff Bridge over the Fontanka. In the angle formed by the Neva and the Fontanka, at the NE. end of the Admiralty Quarter, is an extensive open space, comprising the Field of Mars, on which military parades on a vast scale are held, and the Summer Garden, laid out by Peter the Great. S. of the Field of Mars is the Mikhailovsky Garden, with a splendid memorial church erected on the spot where Alexander II. was killed. On the S. side of this park is the Russian Museum of Alexander III. (now Michael Palace), one of the finest edifices in the city, in Italian style, devoted to Russian art. On the E. side of the park is a grand palace (old Michael Palace) devoted to the military engineering service. Among the other notable edifices and monuments in the part of St. Petersburg situated on the main-land are the palace of the Council of State, the building of the Corps of Pages, the Conservatory (seating 4000 persons), the Imperial Bank, the Tauric Palace (with the fine Tauric Garden, presented by Catharine II. to Potemkin), the Ismailoff Cathedral, the Cathedral of the Transfiguration, the Cathedral of the Resurrection (belonging to the Smolny monastery), the Alexander Nevsky monastery (on the Neva at the SE. corner of the city), an array of great structures devoted to military purposes (constituting a prominent feature of the city), a large number of extensive government buildings, the theatres, the great foundling asylum, the hospitals, many stately buildings devoted to art, music, and education, the monument to Nicholas I., the monument erected to commemorate the victories in the last war against Turkey, and the Moscow and Narva triumphal arches.

The part of the Vassili Ostrov (Basil Island) facing the Admiralty Quarter contains the splendid Bourse, the buildings of the university and of the Academy of Sciences, the Academy of Arts (with a museum), the Mining Institute, the zoological garden, and the Semenoff gallery of paintings, rich in works of Flemish and Dutch art. On a little island in the Great Neva, opposite the E. end of the Admiralty Quarter, is the fortress of Peter and Paul, dating from the infancy of the city. Here is the cathedral of Peter and Paul, containing the tombs of the Russian rulers from Peter the Great. Near by, on the Petersburg Island, is the little wooden house in which Peter the Great lived when he began to lay out his capital. On the Apothecary's Island is the botanical garden.

St. Petersburg is surpassed by few cities in respect to its educational and scientific institutions and learned bodies. The institutions of learning include the university (about 4000 students), Imperial School of Law, Alexander Lyceum, Historico-Philological Institute, Academy of Military Medicine (an institution on a vast scale), Institute of Experimental Medicine, Technological Institute, Mining Institute (with immense collections), Institute of Civil Engineers, the Women's Medical Institute (about 1300 students), the institute of higher studies for women, and the Imperial Academy of Arts. Among the societies for the advancement of science are the Imperial Academy of Sciences, the Russian Geographical Society, the Natural History Society, and the Anthropological, Archæological, Astronomical, Historical, and Physico-chemical societies. The imperial public library is one of the largest collections of books in the world, containing nearly 1,500,000 volumes. At Pulkova, about 10 miles SW. of the city, is one of the leading observatories of Europe.

St. Petersburg is one of the great industrial centres of Russia. It has numerous cotton- and woollen-mills, iron-foundries, machine-shops, paper-mills, chemical-works, and tobacco-factories, and extensive manufactures of leather and glass. The city is the chief seat of the Russian book-trade. The vast domestic trade is greatly facilitated by the extent of the natural and artificial water communications. The value of the imports from foreign countries in 1901 was 145,000,000 rubles, and that of the exports 117,000,000 rubles. Cronstadt is an outer port of St. Petersburg and a great fortress, guarding the approach to the city. Previous to 1885 sea-going vessels could not ascend beyond that place, but in that year a ship canal was opened which enables vessels of great draught to reach the capital.

The climate of St. Petersburg is on the whole a disagreeable one, fluctuations in the weather being frequent, the heat of summer often intolerable, and the number of wet and damp days very large. The winters are not very severe considering the latitude, the mean temperature of January being about 16°.

The population of the city, inclusive of its suburbs, in 1902 was 1,487,720. The number of inhabitants more than quintupled in the course of the nineteenth century. About seven-eighths of the population is Russian. The Germans, Poles, Finns, and Jews collectively constitute about 10 per cent. of the inhabitants. Among the suburban places are Tsarskoye-Selo, Pavlovsk, Peterhof, Oranienbaum, and Gatchina.

St. Petersburg was founded by Peter the Great in 1703, in a territory which he had wrested from the Swedes. In 1712 the place was inaugurated as the capital of Russia. At the time of the death of Peter, in 1725, it had already risen to be a populous city.

Saluzzo, så-loot'so (Fr. Saluces, så'lüss'), a town of northern Italy, province of Cuneo, on an affluent of the Po, at the eastern foot of the Cottian Alps, 17 miles NW. of Cuneo. It consists of an upper town, on a height crowned by a mediæval castle, the residence of the old marquises of Saluzzo, now used as a prison, and a lower town, with a handsome cathedral. It has manufactures of silk, leather, hats, and hardware. In the latter part of the Middle Ages and down to the middle of the sixteenth century the town was the capital of a marquisate. On the extinction of the princely house, France claimed and seized the little state, which, however, in 1601, was relinquished to Savoy. Pop. in 1901, 10,622 (commune, 16,394).

Salvador, sål-vå-dōʀ', a republic of Central America, bounded N. by Honduras, NW. by Guatemala, from which it is in part separated by the Rio Paz, SE. by the Gulf of Fonseca (which separates it from Nicaragua), and S. by the Pacific Ocean. Area, 8130 sq. m. (officially claimed to be 13,150 sq. m.). Its coast-line extends 200 miles and is deeply indented, particularly in the SE., by several good harbors, of which the most frequented are La Unión, the roadstead of Libertad, and Acajútla. The surface from the shore N. for about 15 miles is moderately low and level, but it shortly after becomes broken and rugged and is traversed by mountain-groups, giving it a wild appearance. This is increased by the presence of a considerable number of volcanoes, none of which exceeds 8000 feet in height. Among those that have been most active in historic times are Santa Ana, Quezaltepeque, San Miguel, Conchagua, Conchaguita, and Izalco, the last-named formed towards the close of the eighteenth century and almost continuously active since. Ilopango, formed in the basin of Lake Ilopango in 1880, has almost disappeared. The largest river is the Lempa, which, issuing from the Lake of Guijar, flows SE., forming part of the boundary between Salvador and Honduras. The next in magnitude are the Paz and the San Miguel. Other smaller streams are numerous and important as furnishing the means of irrigation. Lake Guijar, on the Guatemala boundary, is about 15 miles long by 5 miles broad, and Lake Ilopango, 5 miles E. of the town of San Salvador, is 9 miles long by 3 miles broad. Numerous mineral and thermal springs occur in many quarters. The variations of temperature are considerable; but, on the whole, the country is healthy. Earthquakes are very frequent, especially in the region of the capital city, which has been wrecked eleven times since the middle of the sixteenth century.

The soil possesses great fertility and the state is very highly cultivated. The most important crop was for a long time indigo, but it is now little grown. The chief crop is coffee, of which the product in 1901 amounted to 55,600,000 pounds. Other products are rubber, sugar, and tobacco, and some cotton. The part of the coast between Acajútla and Libertad is famous for producing the balsam of Peru. The mineral deposits include those of gold, silver, copper, iron, and mercury and there are about 180 mines in operation. The affairs of the state are administered by a president, elected for four years and assisted by a cabinet of 4 members, and by a single legislative chamber. The republic is divided into 14 departments: San Salvador, La Libertad, Sonsonate, Ahuachapán, Santa Ana, Chalatenango, Cuscatlán, Cabañas, San Miguel, Morazán, La Unión, Usulután, Vicente, and La Paz. Capital, San Salvador. Pop. in 1902, 1,006,848. Salvador was subject to Spain until 1821. From 1823 to 1839 it formed part of the republic of Central America, on whose dissolution it became an independent republic.

Salzburg, zälts'bo͝oRG, a crown-land and duchy of Austria-Hungary, in Cisleithania, bordering on Upper Austria, Styria, Carinthia, Tyrol, and Bavaria. Area, 2767 sq. m. It is in the region of the Alps, which here attain an elevation of nearly 10,000 feet. Nearly the whole of the surface is drained by the Salzach, an affluent of the Inn. There are a number of picturesque little mountain lakes. The principal mineral product is salt, which is obtained in great quantities. The area under cultivation is very small, owing to the rugged character of the region. Capital, Salzburg. The archbishops of Salzburg occupied a prominent place among the princes of the Holy Roman (German) Empire. The see was secularized in 1802–03 and in 1805 Napoleon gave the territory to Austria. Pop. in 1890, 173,510; in 1900, 192,763.

Salzburg (anc. Juvavum), a city of Austria-Hungary, capital of the crown-land of Salzburg, beautifully situated in the midst of a cluster of mountains, on both banks of the Salzach, 156 miles WSW. of Vienna. It is divided into two parts connected by bridges, the old town, in which are the main residence section and the principal buildings, on the left bank of the river, and the newer quarters on the right bank. The ancient fortifications have been converted into residential districts. The old town presents a quaint and pleasing appearance, with its narrow, winding streets, its venerable flat-roofed houses, and its wide squares and handsome fountain. Above it on a rocky eminence towers the imposing castle of Hohen-Salzburg. Of the numerous public places the most noteworthy are the Residenzplatz, flanked by stately edifices, and the Mozartplatz, with a bronze statue of the composer, who was born in Salzburg. The city contains a number of interesting ecclesiastical edifices, among which are the cathedral, in Late-Renaissance style, and the thirteenth-century Franciscan church. Among the prominent secular edifices are the two former archiepiscopal palaces (one of which is now a royal palace), the stately new government buildings, and the buildings of the former university. The educational institutions of Salzburg comprise the museum Caroline-Augusteum, with valuable antiquarian collections and a library of over 50,000 volumes, and a municipal library of over 65,000 volumes. Among interesting features of the town are the old cemeteries and the Summer Riding School, with galleries cut out of the solid rock. Salzburg is the seat of an archbishop. Pop. in 1900, 32,934.

The islands, which lie about 4200 miles SW. of San Francisco, are of volcanic origin and are 14 in number, of which Savaii (660 sq. m.), Upolu (340 sq. m.), Apolima—these three belonging to Germany—Tutuila (54 sq. m.) and Manua (20 sq. m.) are alone of importance. The total area is about 1100 sq. m., with a population (in 1900) of about 38,000, of which number 32,612 were in the German section (350 white inhabitants) and 5800 in the American. The islands are markedly mountainous, in some of the Savaiian cones (active in 1902–03) rising to 5200–5500 feet, and support a luxuriant tropical vegetation. The climate is healthful, but with a tropical temperature, the mean December heat being about 80°. Violent hurricanes are not infrequent and the islands have several times (as in March, 1889) been visited by destructive "tidal" waves. The natives are nearly all Christianized Polynesians, of fine physique, good habits, and marked mental capacity, who have long been noted for their seafaring qualities. Copra is largely exported. The chief settlements are Apia, the capital of the former kingdom, on Upolu, and Pago Pago, with an excellent harbor, on Tutuila. The division of the islands between Germany and the United States was effected by treaty and ratification in 1899–1900.

San Francisco, a city of California, the largest city on the Pacific coast of America, and the commercial emporium of the state. Lat. of Davidson Observatory, 37° 47′ 28″ N.; lon. 122° 25′ 42″ W. It is coextensive with the county of San Francisco and has an area of 47 sq. m. It occupies the end of a peninsula or tongue of land, with the ocean on one side and the bay of San Francisco on the other. The site is uneven, embracing many hills, of which the highest, known as the Twin Peaks, are 925 feet high and form an amphitheatric background to the built-up portion of the city. Several of these hills are traversed by residential streets, from which magnificent prospects over the surrounding country, with the bay and ocean, can be had. Systems of cable and electric railways pass over the hills to the ocean beach on the W., where, from the famous resort known as the Cliff House and the Sutro Heights, a magnificent view of the Seal Rocks and the Pacific Ocean is obtained.

The entrance from the Pacific Ocean to the bay of San Francisco is through the Golden Gate, a water-way with a strikingly beautiful and picturesque setting, about 5 miles long and 1 mile wide. The bay itself extends from Fort Point past the city in a southeasterly direction for about 40 miles, and northward expands into San Pablo Bay, at the NE. end of which is Mare Island with a national navy-yard. Nearly in front of the city are Alcatraz, Angel, and Yerba Buena (or Goat) islands. The entrance to the harbor is defended by Fort Point, which is on the S. shore of the Golden Gate, and by fortifications on Angel and Alcatraz islands. A government military reservation, the Presidio, occupies a portion of the N. end of the peninsula. See SAN FRANCISCO, BAY OF.

The city was originally built of wood, but the earlier constructions have been in the main swept away by successive conflagrations. Most of the houses remain of wood, however, and in 1900 there were less than 4000 buildings constructed of brick and stone. Of recent years many large and costly buildings have been erected, and marble, granite, and terra-cotta have come into extensive use, with interior frames of iron and steel. The most notable public edifices are the city-hall, a vast pile erected on Yerba Buena Park in 1892–96, at an expenditure of upward of $5,000,000; the new post-office, a granite building costing about $5,000,000; Hall of Justice, custom-house, national mint, the building of the Society of California Pioneers, stock and merchants' exchanges, and the vast Ferry Building, with collections illustrating the economic and mining resources of the state, Alaskan ethnology, etc. Among the educational institutions are the Hopkins Art Institute, the Academy of Sciences, Memorial Museum (in Golden Gate Park), Mechanics' Institute, public library, Sutro Library (containing some 200,000 volumes), California School of Mechanical Arts, Cooper Medical College, Cogswell Polytechnic College, College of Notre Dame, Sacred Heart Academy, and Irving Institute. The medical and legal departments of the University of California are also located here.

The chief commercial thoroughfare is Market Street, which has a length of about 3½ miles. Of the residential quarters the most distinguished are "Nob Hill," of California Street, and the Pacific Heights. The largest of the city's parks is Golden Gate Park, which covers an area of 1050 acres. Originally a barren tract of sand-dunes, it has been gradually converted into one of the most attractive parks in the country.

The climate of San Francisco is mild and, on the whole, healthy. The record for 30 years shows the average annual rainfall to be 21–23 inches, the mean temperature 56°, the average monthly maximum temperature 63°, and the average minimum temperature 51°. The highest temperature recorded was 100°, the lowest 29°. Little rain falls during the summer months, or between June and October, and during this period a disagreeable day wind, coming through the Golden Gate, is apt to blow across the city. Most of the railroads that communicate with the city terminate on the bay of San Francisco, where they are directly connected with the city by ferries.

Ship-building (including the construction of the largest battle-ships), sugar-refining, the manufacture of foundry and machine-shop products, slaughtering and packing, and fruit-canning are among the more important of the city's diversified industries. The value of the manufactured product in 1900 was $134,000,000. San Francisco, although no longer the only important port of the Pacific coast, has a most extensive shipping commerce, both with foreign and domestic ports, the shipments of treasure, wheat, liquors, and lumber, and receipts of sugar, coffee, and tea being particularly heavy. Regular lines of steamships connect the city with Japan, China, Hawaii, Australia, New Zealand, the Philippines, Mexico, and the Central and South American ports.

The first white settlement at San Francisco Bay was established in 1776, when an Indian mission (San Francisco de Asisi) was founded by the Spaniards. Sixty years later the little village of Yerba Buena sprang up on the shores of the bay. This place took the name of San Francisco in 1847. The discovery of gold in 1848 attracted hosts of immigrants from all parts of the world to California, and San Francisco, which was their landing place, suddenly developed into a busy city. In the early part of 1849 the population was about 2000; by the end of the year it had increased to 20,000. The place was incorporated as a city in 1850. The population in 1860 was 56,802; in 1870, 149,473; in 1880, 233,959; in 1890, 298,997; in 1900, 342,782. [Postscript. Was greatly damaged by earthquake and fire, April, 1906.]

Santo Domingo, sân'to do-ming'go (also called San Domingo, Saint Domingo, and The Dominican Republic), a state of the West Indies, occupying the eastern and larger part of the island of Haiti, it being nearly twice as large as the republic of Haiti. Area, about 18,000 sq. m. The physical features of Santo Domingo are those of the island generally, and will be found noted in the article HAITI. The loftiest eminence in the land, the Loma Tina, 10,300 feet in height, lies WNW. of the city of Santo Domingo. The greater part of the republic is amenable to successful cultivation, and many of the tropical and subtropical staples are grown in large plantations, especially in the S. and in the W. of the republic. The chief agricultural products exported in 1900 were: sugar, 107,940,000 pounds; coffee, 3,592,000 pounds; cacao, 11,230,000 pounds; tobacco, 17,392,000 pounds. The production and export of cacao had developed in 1902 to 29,000,000 pounds. The country is rich in valuable timber, yielding mahogany, logwood, satin-wood, cedar, etc. The mineral resources, which include gold, copper, iron, and coal, have as yet been but little developed. There are few good roads in the interior and communication is in many parts difficult. There are about 130 miles of railway in operation. Much gold was formerly obtained. The people are mostly of mixed African, Spanish, and Indian descent, and use the Spanish language. The Roman Catholic Church is the prevailing religion. In spite of the richest natural resources, the country is not very prosperous, though utter poverty is rare. The chief towns are Santo Domingo, Samaná, and Santiago de los Caballeros. The chief port is Puerto Plata, on the N. coast (connected by rail with Samaná Bay), which is also an important cable station. The republic of Santo Domingo has existed since 1844. (See HAITI.) The president is chosen by indirect election for a term of 4 years. Capital, Santo Domingo.

Sardinia, sar-din'e-ą (It. Sardegna, sar-dĕn'yä; Gr. Σαρδώ, Sardo; L. Sardinia), the largest island in the Mediterranean Sea after Sicily, forming with some neighboring small islands, the principal of which are Sant' Antioco, San Pietro, Asinara, Maddalena, and Caprera, a compartimento of the kingdom of Italy. It lies about 115 miles (where the distance is least) SW. of the Italian peninsula, and extends from lat. 38° 5′ to 41° 15′ N.; greatest length, from Cape Teulada, in the S., to Punta del Falcone, in the N., 170 miles; greatest breadth, about 80 miles. Area, including the small islands along the coast, 9306 sq. m. It is nearly in the form of a parallelogram, but not without considerable indentations, including the Gulf of Cagliari in the S., the Gulf of Oristano in the W., and the Gulf of Asinara in the NW. On the N. it is separated from the island of Corsica by the Strait of Bonifacio, about 7 miles wide in its narrowest part.

The coast is rugged and precipitous, presenting a succession of headlands. Among the capes on the E. coast are Figari and Comino, at the SE. corner of the island is Cape Carbonara, near the extreme S. is Cape Spartivento, and among the headlands on the W. coast is the lofty Capo dell'Argentiera. Sardinia is in great part covered with mountains, the mountain-mass of Gennargentu, a little E. of the centre of the island, rising over 6000 feet above the level of the sea (Perdu Crapias, 6017 feet). There are several extensive and fruitful plains, the largest, called Campidano, stretching diagonally across the southern part of the island from the Gulf of Oristano to that of Cagliari. There are numerous precipitous streams, some of considerable length. The Gulf of Oristano receives the river Tirso, and the Gulf of Cagliari, the river Samassi. The rivers Flumentosa and Mannu empty on the E. coast. About one-fourth of the surface is covered with forests. The soil is fertile, but methods of cultivation are very primitive. The holdings are very small. Wheat is extensively raised and much attention is given to the production of wine. Other agricultural products are olives, oranges, lemons, and tobacco. There are large numbers of cattle, sheep, and goats. The SW. part of the island is a metalliferous region, yielding lead, zinc, silver, antimony, etc. Among the wild animals is the mouffion (or wild sheep). The island suffers greatly from malarial fever. The Sardinians represent a mixture of Italian blood with that of various nationalities. They are for the most part a simple, sturdy, rustic folk, very short of stature. The dialects spoken in some parts approach the Spanish. Education is very backward. At the head of the educational institutions are the universities of Cagliari and Sassari. The exports include wine, minerals, salt, olives and olive oil, tunny-fish, grain, cheese, charcoal, etc. The principal port is Cagliari. There are several hundred miles of railway. Sardinia comprises two provinces, named from the two chief towns, Sassari and Cagliari. Pop. in 1901, 791,754. Capital, Cagliari.

History.—The Carthaginians made themselves masters of part of Sardinia, but soon after the first Punic War (264–241 B.C.) they were forced to relinquish the island to the Romans. In the first half of the Middle Ages it was in the possession successively of the Vandals, Greeks, and Saracens. The Pisans and Genoese expelled the Mohammedans, and for a time the Pisans were in possession. In 1326 it became subject to Aragon. By the treaties of 1713–14, the island passed from Spain to Austria. In 1720 Austria ceded it to Savoy in exchange for Sicily, and it has ever since formed part of the dominions of the house of Savoy.

Sardinia, Kingdom of, a state which existed previous to the foundation, in 1860–61, of the present kingdom of Italy, of which it was the nucleus. It was ruled by the house of Savoy and comprised Piedmont, Savoy, Nice, Liguria, and the island of Sardinia. Victor Amadeus II., duke of Savoy, received Sicily from Spain at the close of the War of the Spanish Succession (1701–13). In 1720 he obtained Sardinia from Austria in exchange for Sicily, and erected his dominions into the kingdom of Sardinia. The house of Savoy was stripped of its possessions on the main-land by the French at the time of the Revolution, but in 1814–15 it recovered them and obtained in addition the territories of the former republic of Genoa (Liguria). In 1861 Victor Emmanuel II. of Sardinia, having united all Italy, with the exception of Venetia and part of the Papal States, under his sway, assumed the title of King of Italy. In the preceding year Savoy and Nice had been separated from the dominions of the house of Savoy and transferred to France.

Savoy, sa-voi′ (It. Savoia or Savoja, sȧvo′yȧ; Fr. Savoie, sȧ‘vwȧ′; L. Sapaudia and Sabaudia), a region in the SE. part of France, formerly one of the divisions of the kingdom of Sardinia. It is bounded on the N. by Switzerland, from which, in that direction, it is in great part separated by the Lake of Geneva, and on the E. by Switzerland and Piedmont. Previous to its annexation to France, Savoy was divided into the two divisions of Chambéry and Annecy, the former comprising the provinces of Savoy Proper, Upper Savoy, Maurienne, and Tarantaise, and the latter the provinces of Génevois, Faucigny, and Chablais. It now forms two departments, SAVOIE and HAUTE-SAVOIE. Area, about 4000 sq. m. Savoy is situated in the region of the western Alps, its surface being entirely covered by the mountains. The summit of Mont Blanc, the culminating point of the Alps, is just within its borders. Savoy belongs to the basin of the Rhone, whose affluents, the Arve and the Isère, flow respectively through the northern and the southern part. There are two lakes of considerable size, Bourget and Annecy. Among the mineral springs are those of Aix-les-Bains, Saint-Gervais, and Evian. The products include cereals, wine, fruit, silk, tobacco, and cheese. The Savoyards are essentially French. Chambéry is the capital of the department of Savoie and Annecy of that of Haute-Savoie. Pop. in 1901, 518,584.

The history of the house of Savoy, which in the line of Savoy-Carignan is the reigning dynasty in Italy, goes back to the early part of the eleventh century. From that time there were counts of Savoy, whose dominions were included in the Holy Roman (German) Empire. The possessions of the house of Savoy were soon extended so as to comprise parts of Piedmont and Switzerland. By the close of the Middle Ages a great part of Piedmont was under its sway. In 1416 the county of Savoy was erected into a duchy. By this time the state was practically independent of the empire. In Switzerland the rulers of Savoy did not succeed in permanently maintaining their hold. In 1601 the marquisate of Saluzzo was annexed to Savoy. Part of the marquisate of Montferrat was acquired in 1631, and the remainder followed in 1703. In 1720 the duke of Savoy, having obtained the island of Sardinia in exchange for Sicily (ceded by Spain to Savoy in 1713), assumed the title of King of Sardinia. In 1860 Savoy was transferred to France. See SARDINIA, KINGDOM OF.

Saxe-Altenburg, sax al'tẹn-bŭrg (Ger. Sachsen-Altenburg, zåx'ẹn ål'tẹn-bŏŏRG\',—i.e., "Saxony-Altenburg"), a duchy of central Germany, comprising two nearly equal portions separated by Reuss-Schleiz (Reuss, Younger Line). It borders on Prussian Saxony, the kingdom of Saxony, and Saxe-Weimar. Area, 510 sq. m. The western half belongs to the region of the Thuringian Forest and is watered by the Saale and its affluent, the Orla. The eastern half is watered by the river Pleisse. The chief industries are agriculture, forestry, and cattle-rearing. Capital, Altenburg. Pop. in 1890, 170,864; in 1900, 194,914. The inhabitants are mainly Protestants. Saxe-Altenburg has 1 vote in the Bundesrat and 1 member in the Reichstag.

Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, sax ko'bŭrg go'tå (Ger. Sachsen-Coburg-Gotha, zåx'ẹn ko'bŏŏRG go'tå), a duchy of Germany, in Thuringia, composed of the duchies of Coburg and Gotha. Coburg is enclosed by the territories of Bavaria and Saxe-Meiningen. Gotha borders on Prussian Saxony, Saxe-Weimar, Saxe-Meiningen, the Prussian province of Hesse-Nassau, and Schwarzburg-Sondershausen. Area, 755 sq. m. The country is a picturesque region of mountains and fertile valleys, belonging to the Thuringian Forest, whose highest peaks (over 3000 feet) are in the duchy of Gotha. The inhabitants belong in the main to the agricultural class, but there are extensive and diversified manufactures. Capitals, Coburg and Gotha. Pop. in 1890, 206,513; in 1900, 229,550. The great bulk of the people are Protestants. Saxe-Coburg-Gotha has 1 vote in the Bundesrat and 2 members in the Reichstag.

Saxe-Meiningen, sax mī'ning-ẹn (Ger. Sachsen-Meiningen, zåx'ẹn mī'ning-ẹn), a duchy of Germany, in Thuringia, consisting mainly of a long and narrow zone of a crescent shape, the concavity turned northward, bounded by Saxe-Weimar, the Prussian province of Hesse-Nassau, Bavaria, Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, and some of the lesser Thuringian states. Area, 953 sq. m. It is a hilly and mountainous region, traversed by the ranges of the Thuringian Forest, whose peaks rise to a height of about 2800 feet. Forests cover about two-fifths of the surface. The area of good agricultural land is limited. The manufactures are extensive, embracing glass, china, textiles, iron- and woodenwares, toys, leather, beer, etc. The greater part of the surface is drained by the river Werra (one of the head-streams of the Weser) and by the Saale, an affluent of the Elbe. There are several small lakes. The great majority of the inhabitants are Lutherans. Capital, Meiningen. Other considerable towns are Hildburghausen, Sonneberg, Saalfeld, and Pössneck. Pop. in 1890, 223,832; in 1900, 250,731. Saxe-Meiningen has 1 vote in the Bundesrat and 2 members in the Reichstag.

Saxe-Weimar-Eisenach, sax wī'mạr ī'zẹn-åK\' (Ger. Sachsen-Weimar-Eisenach, zåx'ẹn wī'mar ī'zẹn-åK\'), a grand-duchy of central Germany, in Thuringia, consisting of three main divisions and a large number of exclaves. The middle portion, that containing the towns of Weimar, Jena, and Apolda, is bounded mainly by Prussian Saxony, Schwarzburg-Rudolstadt, and Saxe-Altenburg. The eastern main division, that containing the town of Neustadt, is separated from the middle one by Saxe-Altenburg and extends eastward as far as the borders of the kingdom of Saxony. The western main division, that containing the town of Eisenach, is bounded by Prussian Saxony, the Prussian province of Hesse-Nassau, Bavaria, Saxe-Meiningen, and Saxe-Coburg-Gotha. Area of the grand-duchy, 1388 sq. m. The surface is hilly and mountainous, the region embracing parts of the Thuringian Forest, of the Rhöngebirge, and of the highlands of the Vogtland (on the borders of Saxony). There are some peaks exceeding 2500 feet in elevation. Saxe-Weimar almost wholly belongs to the basins of the Elbe and the Weser, being drained by the Saale, an affluent of the former, and by the Werra, one of the head-streams of the latter. The division containing Weimar is best adapted to agriculture. The region of Eisenach contains extensive forests. The various cereals are extensively grown and the cultivation of fruit is of some importance. The manufacturing industries are well developed, the textile industry (including the manufacture of hosiery) being in the lead. There are manufactures of glass, china, toys, superior optical instruments, etc. Jena is the seat of a famous university. The great bulk of the inhabitants are Protestants. Capital, Weimar. Pop. in 1890, 326,091; in 1900, 362,873. Saxe-Weimar has 1 vote in the Bundesrat and 3 members in the Reichstag.

Saxony (Ger. Sachsen, zåx'ẹn), KINGDOM OF, a state of the German Empire, the fifth in size and the third in order of population, bounded on the N. and NE. by Prussia (provinces of Saxony and Silesia), on the SE. by Bohemia, on the SW. (for a short distance) by Bavaria, and on the W. by Reuss, Saxe-Weimar, Saxe-Altenburg, and Prussian Saxony. Length, 144 miles; breadth, 15 to 88 miles. Area, 5787 sq. m. Pop. in 1900, 4,202,216.

All but about 5 per cent. of the inhabitants are Protestants. The Catholics number about 200,000 and the Jews about 13,000. The royal family belongs to the Catholic church. The non-German element in the population (in addition to the foreigners) is that of the Wends, a Slavic people who live in the extreme E. of the kingdom, in a portion of old Lusatia, and who number about 50,000. The kingdom is divided into the circles of Dresden, Leipsic, Bautzen, Chemnitz, and Zwickau. The chief towns are Dresden, Leipsic, Chemnitz, Plauen, Zwickau, Meissen, Zittau, Freiberg, Bautzen, and Glauchau. The capital is Dresden.

A large part of Saxony is mountainous or hilly. On the SE., along a great part of the frontier on the side of Bohemia, stretches the Erzgebirge (Ore Mountains), reaching in the Fichtelberg an elevation of nearly 4000 feet. N. of their eastern end, on both sides of the river Elbe, is the sandstone mountain region called the Saxon Switzerland, with its fantastically castellated peaks, rising to a height of about 1800 ft. above the sea. The northwestern corner of the kingdom, the region about Leipsic, is an extensive plain. The river Elbe traverses Saxony from SE. to NW. It is navigable throughout the whole of its course within the kingdom. The largest river, after the Elbe, is the Mulde, which flows N. through the western part of the country and joins the Elbe beyond its borders. Saxony possesses a fertile soil, which is in a high state of cultivation. A large area is devoted to rye, oats, and potatoes, which are the leading crops. Fruit is extensively cultivated. The forests cover about one-fourth of the surface. Much attention is given to the rearing of live-stock. The sheep yield a fine quality of wool, but sheep-breeding has declined greatly. Saxony is rich in minerals, which include coal, silver, iron, lead, tin, arsenic, copper, cobalt, bismuth, and antimony, besides a variety of precious and semi-precious stones, marble, sandstone (largely quarried), porcelain-clay, etc. The great mining-centre is Freiberg. There are numerous mineral springs, the best known being those of Elster. Saxony is more actively engaged in manufactures than any section of Germany except Westphalia and Rhenish Prussia. The textile industry takes the lead, a vast number of persons being employed in the weaving of linen, cotton, and woollen fabrics and in the manufacture of knitted goods, embroidery, lace, and passementerie. The manufacture of articles of apparel and finery is carried on very extensively. There are great establishments engaged in turning out machinery of all kinds. Food products are manufactured on a large scale. The so-called Dresden china, manufactured at Meissen, is famous. Paper-making, brewing, wood-working, the preparation of chemicals, distilling, the manufacture of articles of leather, and piano-making are important industries. Leipsic vies with Berlin as the greatest publishing centre of Germany, and is the foremost place in the world in the extent of its book trade. The iron-industry is on a large scale. Saxony possesses one of the leading universities of Germany, that of Leipsic. The mining academy of Freiberg is the most celebrated institution of its kind in the world. Dresden has a notable polytechnic institute and the conservatory of music at Leipsic is world-renowned. The government of Saxony is a constitutional monarchy. There are six ministerial departments,—justice, finance, interior, education and ecclesiastical affairs, foreign affairs, war. The legislature consists of two chambers. The first chamber is composed of princes, nobles, ecclesiastics, burgomasters of the principal cities, deputies representing nobiliary estates, a few members nominated by the king, and a representative from the university of Leipsic. The second chamber, or house of representatives, is elected by indirect suffrage. The voters are divided into 3 classes, the representation being unequal. Saxony has 4 votes in the Bundesrat and sends 23 representatives to the Reichstag.

History.—In addition to the kingdom so-called, the name Saxony is a designation of one of the provinces of Prussia, and is borne also by four of the Thuringian states (Sachsen in the case of these being contracted in English to Saxe). It designates a very different region from the Saxony of the early period of German history. The home of the ancient Saxons was a territory extending southwestward from the river Elbe, near its mouth, nearly to the Rhine, in the vicinity of Cologne. It was from this region that the Saxons came who, with the Jutes and Angles, conquered Britain. Towards the close of the eighth century Charles the Great subdued the Saxons of the main-land and forced them to accept Christianity. Soon after the partition of the Frankish realm by the grandsons of Charles, about the middle of the ninth century, the national duchy of the Saxons makes its appearance,—one of the great fiefs of the new German kingdom. In 919 Henry the Fowler, duke of Saxony, was elected king of Germany. His son Otho succeeded him on the royal throne, and his coronation by the Pope at Rome in 962 inaugurated the Holy Roman Empire of the German Nation. This monarch conferred Saxony on Hermann Billung, whose house ruled till 1106. Shortly before the middle of the twelfth century the duchy came into the possession of the house of Guelph (Welf). Henry the Lion of this house, who was also duke of Bavaria, was a feared vassal of Frederick Barbarossa. In 1181 the emperor brought about the fall of Henry, whose dominions were partitioned. The title of Duke of Saxony was now borne by Bernhard of Askanien, a petty prince who had some possessions in the region of the Elbe. The lands of his house were divided about the middle of the thirteenth century and there were two little duchies of Saxony, Saxe-Lauenburg and Saxe-Wittenberg. In the Golden Bull of the emperor Charles IV., issued in 1356, the duke of Saxe-Wittenberg was recognized as one of the imperial electors. In 1422 the line of Saxe-Wittenberg became extinct and the duchy and electoral dignity passed in 1423 to the margrave of Meissen (Misnia), of the House of Wettin. This house, in addition to the Saxon and Misnian dominions, acquired possessions in Thuringia. Its dominions collectively became known as Saxony. In 1485 they were divided into two states,—Saxony of the Ernestine Line (or electoral Saxony) and Saxony of the Albertine Line (or ducal Saxony), the capitals being respectively Wittenberg and Dresden. Wittenberg was the cradle of the Reformation.

In 1547 the elector of Saxony, the main head of the Protestants, in the war of the Schmalkaldic League was deprived of his dominions and electoral dignity, which were conferred upon Maurice of the ducal line. The Thuringian possessions were, however, restored to the Ernestine house, and out of these arose the small Saxon duchies. In 1635 Saxony acquired Lusatia. Two electors of Saxony in succession occupied the royal throne of Poland between 1697 and 1763. In 1806 Saxony was elevated to the rank of a kingdom. The king of Saxony was head of the duchy of Warsaw from 1807–13. In 1815 Saxony, in consequence of its alliance with Napoleon, was deprived by the powers of half of its dominions, which were transferred to Prussia. From 1866–70 the kingdom was part of the North German Confederation, and in 1871 it became part of the new German Empire.

Saxony, a province of Prussia, having on the NE. and E. the province of Brandenburg, on the W. Brunswick and the provinces of Hanover and Hesse-Nassau, and on the S. the Thuringian states and the kingdom of Saxony. Enclosed within it are the duchy of Anhalt and portions of Schwarzburg-Sondershausen, Brunswick, Schwarzburg-Rudolstadt, and Saxe-Weimar, and there are detached fragments of the province enclosed within the Thuringian states. Area, 9751 sq. m. In the extreme W. are the Harz mountains, while the southern portion belongs to the Thuringian highlands. The bulk of the province forms part of the great North German lowland. Prussian Saxony is watered by the Elbe, with its tributaries, the Black Elster, Mulde, and the Saale (which receives the Unstrut). This province is on the whole the most fertile portion of Prussia, producing bountiful crops of grain, potatoes, and beets (for sugar). Vegetable farming and horticulture are extensively carried on and wine, hops, and chiccory are produced. Prussian Saxony has the most productive coal-fields in Germany and rich deposits of common salt and other salts. Vast quantities of kainite are obtained at Stassfurt. Schleswig-Holstein (hol′stīne), a province of Prussia, formed out of the duchies of Schleswig, Holstein, and Lauenburg, formerly belonging to Denmark. It is coextensive with the government-district of Schleswig, and is bounded on the N. by Denmark, on the E. by the Baltic Sea, Mecklenburg, and Lübeck, on the S. and SW. by the province of Hanover, from which it is separated by the river Elbe and Hamburg, and on the W. by the North Sea. It includes the North Frisian Islands, in the North Sea, and the islands of Alsen and Fehmarn, in the Baltic. Area, 7338 sq. m. The northern half is Schleswig; the southern, Holstein and Lauenburg, the latter a small district. The E. coast is deeply indented by fjord-like bays. Schleswig-Holstein is in the main a level region. There is a hilly tract in the E., while the W. coast is extremely low, so that it has to be protected by dikes against the sea. The chief river is the Eider, flowing into the North Sea, formerly the boundary between Schleswig and Holstein. There are a number of lakes, the largest being Plön Lake. The soil is fertile in the E. and W., but the middle portion is unproductive moorland. Large crops of cereals and potatoes are raised. In no part of Prussia is the industry of cattle-breeding in such an advanced state as here. Horses are extensively reared. The forests cover but a small area. The manufacturing industries occupy a very subordinate position. The province is traversed by the Kaiser Wilhelm Canal, connecting the Baltic and North seas. The leading institution of learning is the university of Kiel. Pop. in 1900 (inclusive of Helgoland), 1,387,968, nearly all Protestants. About one-tenth of the inhabitants are Danes. Capital, Schleswig.

Schleswig, after having been an object of contention between the Germans and Danes, passed into the possession of the kings of Denmark in the eleventh century. It was treated as a separate country, being for a long period ruled by Danish governors or princes (dukes of Schleswig) belonging to the Danish dynasty and ultimately becoming an independent state under Danish overlordship. Towards the close of the fourteenth century Schleswig was united with the county of Holstein, which was included in the Holy Roman (German) Empire. The duchy of Schleswig continued to be a fief of Denmark. From 1460 the kings of Denmark were rulers of Schleswig-Holstein. In 1474 Holstein was erected from a county into a duchy. The duchies attempted ineffectually to liberate themselves from Denmark with the aid of the German states in 1848–50 (first Schleswig-Holstein War). In 1864 Prussia and Austria (in the second Schleswig-Holstein War) wrested the duchies from Denmark, which also had to relinquish Lauenburg. The victory over Austria in 1866 enabled Prussia to incorporate these regions into her dominions. Lauenburg was not constituted part of the province of Schleswig-Holstein until 1876. See SCHLESWIG and HOLSTEIN.

Scotland, the northern division of the island of Great Britain, between lat. 54° 38′ and 58° 40′ 24″ N. and lon. 1° 46′ and 6° 8′ 30″ W. Area, 30,405 sq. m. (inclusive of 609 sq. m. of inland waters). It is bounded on the N. and W. by the Atlantic Ocean and on the E. by the North Sea, and is in part separated from England by Solway Firth, an arm of the Irish Sea, and by the river Tweed, which flows into the North Sea. The Cheviot Hills extend along a portion of the boundary. The greatest length, from NNE. to SSW., between Dunnet Head and the Mull of Galloway, is 287 miles. The breadth varies from about 150 miles to 40 miles. The distance between Leith, the port of Edinburgh, on the Firth of Forth, which indents the E. coast, and Greenock, on the Firth of Clyde, on the W. coast, is about 60 miles. Numerous islands line the coasts and form one of their peculiar features. On the E. coast these islands are few and small; but on the N. are the two large groups of the Orkneys and Shetlands, while on the W. a series of groups (the Hebrides or Western Isles) stretch almost uninterruptedly from N. to S., at a short distance from the coast, forming no insignificant portion of the whole area of the country. The largest of them are Lewis, North Uist, South Uist, Skye, Mull, Jura, and Islay. In the SW. the islands of Arran and Bute, in the Firth of Clyde, form a separate county under the name of the latter. The coast-line of Scotland is very largely developed as the result of a great number of oceanic arms, estuaries, or fjords projecting into the land, of which the narrower ones are usually termed lochs and the broader and more extensive ones firths. Those on the W. coast are the Firth of Clyde; Loch Long, between Argyllshire and Dumbartonshire; lochs Fyne and Linnhe, in Argyllshire; Loch Eil, in Inverness; lochs Carron, Torridon, and Broom, in Ross and Cromarty; and Assynt, in Sutherland. On the E. coast are the large indentations known as Moray Firth, Firth of Tay, and the Firth of Forth.

Loch Ness, in Inverness, a virtually enclosed narrow arm of the sea, occupies part of the deep depression known as the Great Glen or Glen More (or Albin), and communicates by means of the Ness River in the NE. with Moray Firth, and by means of the Caledonian Canal and other waters with Loch Lochy and the more distant Firth of Lorne. This famous canal, which thus unites the waters of the North Sea with those of the Atlantic, and is chiefly a tourist route, occupies what seems to be an ancient fracture or a subsided trough. The Atlantic and North Sea waters are also united by the Forth and Clyde Canal. Other minor canals connect a number of the interior lochs with the sea, as the Crinan Canal, between Loch Fyne and Jura Sound. There are numerous headlands and promontories on the coast, the chief of which are St. Abb's Head, in Berwickshire; Fife Ness, the termination of the peninsula of Fife;

Buddon Ness, in Forfarshire; Girdle Ness, at the mouth of the Dee, in Kincardineshire; Buchan Ness and Peterhead Point, in Aberdeenshire, the most easterly land in Scotland; Kinnaird Head, also in Aberdeen; Tarbet Ness, in Ross and Cromarty, on the N. side of the entrance to Moray Firth; Noss Head, Duncansby Head, and Dunnet Head, in Caithness; Strathey Point, Witen Head, Cape Wrath, and Rhua Stoir, in Sutherland; the Mull of Kintyre, the extremity of the long peninsula of Kintyre, in Argyll; Corsewall Point, at the NW. extremity of the Rhinns of Galloway, in Wigtownshire; and Mull Head and the Mull of Galloway, also in Wigtown. The chief rivers of Scotland are the Tweed, Forth, Tay, North and South Esk, Dee, Don, Deveron, Spey, Lossie, Findhorn, Ness, Beauly, Carron, Oykel, Brora, Helmsdale, and Wick, on the eastern side; and the Annan, Nith, Dee, Cree, Ayr, Doon, and Clyde, on the S. and W. Of the large number of interior lakes, known as lochs, many of which are noted for their beautiful scenery, may be mentioned Loch Lomond, on the borders of Dumbartonshire and the county of Stirling; the closely neighboring Loch Katrine; lochs Tay, Erricht, Rannoch, and Earn, in Perthshire; Loch Awe, in Argyllshire; Loch Ness, already referred to as occupying the deep depression of the Caledonian Canal; and Loch Leven, in Kinross. Loch Morar, in the western part of Inverness, separated by only a short space from the ocean, is the deepest lake in the British Isles, its depth being 1070 feet.

Relief of the Land.—In its vertical relief Scotland can readily be divided into three broad sections, which are sharply defined by NE. and SW. techtonic lines, or lines produced by geological structure (faulting). (1) The largest division is that of the Highlands in the N., occupying more than one-half of the area of the country, and consisting of a fairly lofty upland of nearly horizontally disposed strata. The summits rise to a generally uniform level, while the valleys show deep eroded action, continued into Tertiary and Post-Tertiary times. It is in this region that the grandeur of Scottish scenery is developed,—the rugged and precipitous mountain-walls, the deep and secluded valleys, partially overgrown with heather and gorze, and the long lines of inlets that project from the oceanic borders into the land. The Highlands, which remain to this day a wild and largely inaccessible region, abounding in a fair amount of game, have an average elevation of about 1500 feet, but individual summits rise to nearly three times this height. Ben Nevis, in the SW. part of Inverness, and close to the depression of the Great Glen, is the culminating point of the British Isles, 4406 ft. Scarcely less lofty is Ben Macdhui, on the borders of Aberdeen and Banff, 4296 ft. Other prominent summits are Cairngorm, 4084 ft.; Ben Lawers, 3985 ft.; Ben More, 3843 ft.; Ben-y-Gloe, 3770 ft.; and Ben Wyvis, 3429 ft. In this section of Scotland, constituted largely of ancient Archæan rocks, and to which all the western islands (Hebrides, etc.) belong, volcanic outflows have had an important share in shaping the physiognomy of the land-surface, and have supplied vast lava-sheets, columnar basalts (as in Fingal's Cave, in the island of Staffa), and the remains or wrecks of hundreds of volcanic cones (Skye, Mull, etc.). (2) The second natural division is that of the sub-central Lowlands, which lie immediately S. of the Highlands, whose border-range is designated the Grampian Mountains,—a subsided block of the earth's crust, with the surface resting on Carboniferous or Devonian strata, and into which enter some of the larger firths or fjords (Clyde), and which contains many of the finest lakes (Lomond, Katrine, Leven, Tay, etc.). The general elevation of this region is under 500 ft., dropping in the lowest divide between the North Sea and the Atlantic Ocean to 200 ft. Among the subordinate ranges of heights are the Sidlaw and Ochil hills, in Perthshire and Forfarshire, the Pentland Hills, SW. of Edinburgh, and the Lammermoor Hills, mainly in Haddington. This section has a soil of great fertility and rich deposits of coal and iron, and here are most of the great centres of population, Dundee, Edinburgh, Glasgow, Greenock, Leith, Paisley, etc. (3) The third division is that of the Southern Uplands, rising in their highest point, Mount Merrick, to 2700 ft., and continued to the frontier of England. This is largely a sheep-raising region.

Climate.—The climate in the W. and S. parts is mild, but humid; in the central elevated regions, chilly and humid; in the eastern plains and Lowlands, more genial, although these sections are exposed in spring to chilly easterly winds. In the Lowlands the summer is not so warm as that of England, but the winter is, on the whole, milder, and the climate is salubrious. Meteorological observations made over most parts of the main-land and islands indicate that the mean temperature for January is 38° and for July, 57½°. Mean annual temperature of the main-land, 48°; of the Shetland Islands, about 45°. In general, much more rain falls on the W. coast than on the E., the range being from about 80 inches on the western rim of the Highlands to 30 and 35 inches on the E. coast. On the southern uplands the precipitation is about 60 inches. Prevailing winds, W. and SW.; in spring, N. and NE. Only about 5 per cent. of the area of Scotland is covered with forests, largely of pine. Except in the greater preponderance of Alpine plants, the flora of Scotland resembles very much that of England. Most of the animals are likewise those of England. A conspicuous faunal type of the Highlands is the red deer.

Agriculture, Fisheries, Minerals.—Only about one-fourth of the area of Scotland is under cultivation, a great part of the country being rendered unfit for agriculture on account of its rugged character. The principal cereals are oats and barley. The area under wheat is small. Potatoes, turnips, and beans are extensively cultivated. Sheep-raising is an important branch of rural economy. The fisheries are a great source of wealth to the Scottish people. Herring, haddock, cod, and other fish abound in the seas, and salmon are caught in the rivers. The value of the fish (exclusive of shell-fish) landed on the coasts of Scotland in 1903 was £2,401,253. Dundee is the principal seat of the whale- and seal-fishing in Great Britain. The leading mineral products of Scotland are coal, iron, and oil-shales. The total value of the mineral products in 1902 was £13,524,000. The great bulk of this amount represented the value of the coal, of which 34,000,000 tons were mined, about one-half of which came from the Lanarkshire district.

Manufactures.—Scotland has risen in recent times to the position of one of the important manufacturing countries of Europe. The textile and iron- and steel-industries are represented on a vast scale. Glasgow is a great seat of the manufacture of cotton; Dundee, of that of linen and jute; Paisley, of cotton-thread. Various textile manufactures are carried on in Aberdeen and Kilmarnock. The Clyde is the principal seat of the ship-building industry in the world. There are great iron-works and machine-shops in Glasgow, Coatbridge, Dundee, Aberdeen, Carron, and Motherwell, in addition to the ship-building towns of Greenock, Partick, and Govan. The manufacture of chemicals is carried on on an extensive scale at Glasgow and elsewhere. There are numerous distilleries (Scotch whiskey) and breweries in Glasgow, Edinburgh, and Aberdeen. Edinburgh is one of the leading publishing centres of the Anglo-Saxon world. Among other industries are sugar-refining and the manufacture of paper, gloves, hosiery, carpets, shawls, and glass. At the beginning of 1903 there were 3580 miles of railway in Scotland. The principal seaports are Glasgow, Leith (the port of Edinburgh), Dundee, Aberdeen, and Greenock.

Population, Representation in Parliament, Religion, etc.—The population of Scotland in 1851 was 2,888,742; in 1881, 3,735,537; in 1891, 4,025,647; in 1901, 4,472,103. The country is divided into 33 counties, which with their population in 1901 are as follows:

Since 1707 Scotland and England have been united for legislative purposes under the name of Great Britain. Scotland is represented in the British House of Commons by 72 members,—39 from the counties, 31 from the boroughs, and 2 from the universities. In the British House of Lords it is represented by 16 peers, elected for the duration of parliament by the Scottish peers. There is a Local Government Board for Scotland, presided over by the Secretary for Scotland, who is a member of the cabinet. The capital is Edinburgh. Scotland still retains its ancient system of jurisprudence based upon the Roman or civil law. The Gaelic tongue is spoken by between 200,000 and 250,000 persons, but of these only about one-fifth speak Gaelic alone to the exclusion of English. About seven-eighths of the people of Scotland belong to the Presbyterian church. The clergy are all on the same level, the parishioners choosing their ministers. The Presbyterians are about equally divided between the adherents of the Church of Scotland (the established church, which has relations with the civil powers) and those of the United Free Church of Scotland, which was organized in 1900 by the union of the Free Church of Scotland (founded by a secession from the established church in 1843) and the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland. The supreme court in each of these churches is the General Assembly. About one-tenth of the inhabitants (mainly Irish or of Irish descent) are Roman Catholics. Scotland possesses 4 universities,—those of Edinburgh, Glasgow, Aberdeen, and Saint-Andrews.

History.—The part of Britain N. of the firths of Forth and Clyde, comprising the bulk of modern Scotland, was called by the ancients Caledonia. This portion of the island was not subdued by the Romans. In A.D. 80–81 Agricola advanced the Roman frontiers as far as the firths of Forth and Clyde. At the time when Rome began to be pressed by the Germanic invaders the people called Picts (who, in spite of their Celtic speech, are held by some not to have been of Celtic blood), sallied forth from their mountain-fastnesses in Caledonia and harassed Britain. The Picts were joined by the Scots from Ireland. When the Roman legions were withdrawn, these invaders overran the country of the Britons. About the close of the fifth century the Scots founded the realm of Dalriada in the W. part of the country, N. of the Clyde. The Picts and Scots were finally checked by the Angles, who pressed forward into the Lowlands of Scotland. The SE. corner of the country formed part of the realm of Bernicia, which towards the close of the sixth century was united with its neighbor to the S., Deira, into the kingdom of Northumbria. The Picts were pressed back beyond the Forth. In the SW. corner of the country, in Cumbria (which embraced also the NW. corner of England), the Cymric inhabitants held their ground. In the second half of the sixth century Columba spread Christianity among the Picts; the Scots had already received the Gospel. About 843 Kenneth MacAlpin, king of the Scots, united the Pictish kingdom with his own. His realm was known as the kingdom of Alban. The Pictish and Scottish nationalities were gradually fused. By the beginning of the eleventh century, through the acquisition of Cumbria, Lothian, and other territories, the whole of what is now the main-land of Scotland had come under the rule of the Scottish kings. It was not until then that the name Scotland came to be recognized as a designation pure and simple of the country of the Scots, it having been originally borne by the Irish. The Orkney and Shetland islands and part of the Hebrides were long in the possession of the Scandinavians.

In the period following the Norman conquest of England large numbers of Anglo-Saxons settled in Scotland, which was gradually transformed into a land much more Teutonic than Celtic. King David I. (1124–53) effected much in the way of introducing English civilization into the country, which enjoyed a long period of prosperity, brought to a close by the contentions regarding the succession to the crown at the end of the thirteenth century and the wars that followed. Edward I. of England took advantage of the internal dissensions to assert his sway over Scotland, which for a brief time was under English domination, until the victory of Robert Bruce at Bannockburn (1314) secured the liberation of the country. The Stuart dynasty was inaugurated in 1371. The Reformation was established by parliament in 1560, and in 1592 Presbyterianism was declared by parliament to be the religion of the kingdom. In 1603 the crowns of Scotland and England were united by the accession of James VI. (I.) to the English throne on the death of Elizabeth. In 1707 the legislative union of the two countries took place, Scotland giving up its parliament. There were rebellions in favor of the Stuarts in 1715 and 1745–46. The nineteenth century witnessed the transformation of Scotland from a land of humble industrial activities, but playing a great rôle in the intellectual life of the world, into a busy manufacturing country.

Sebas'topol (Russ. Sevastopol, sā-vās-to'pol), a seaport of Russia, on the Black Sea, in the government of Taurida, situated near the S. extremity of the Crimea, on a projection of land, 37 miles SW. of Simferopol. It stands on a narrow bay which forms one of the best harbors on the Russian coast. The entrance is strongly fortified and the town is further protected by chains of forts. Sebastopol has practically sprung up anew since the ruin wrought by the Allies in 1855, and this transformation is reflected in its broad boulevards and modern edifices. The principal buildings are the Peter-Paul cathedral, modelled after the temple of Theseus at Athens, and the Vladimir cathedral, with a richly decorated interior. The town has numerous monuments erected to the memory of the soldiers in the Crimean War, and there is a cemetery containing the bodies of about 127,000 victims of the conflict. The town has some manufactures and a ship-building establishment.

Sebastopol was founded by Catharine II. in 1784, and about twenty years later Alexander I. made it the principal naval station of Russia on the Black Sea. Under Nicholas I. fortifications were constructed which were supposed to render the place impregnable. The siege of Sebastopol in the Crimean War belongs to the most memorable military annals of modern times. In 1854 the English and French undertook an expedition for the reduction of the fortress. They were aided by the Sardinians and Turks. The investment of the place began in October of that year. The defence was conducted with the greatest skill by Todleben, and the fortress held out until Sept. 8, 1855, when the efforts of the besiegers were crowned with success. Pop. in 1897, 44,016.

Senegal, sẹn\e-gawl′ (Fr. Sénégal, sà\nà\gàl′), a river of French western equatorial Africa, rises, under the name of Bafing ("black river"), in about lat. 10° 30′ N., lon. 10° 40′ W., near Timbo (Tembu), where its sources are separated from those of the Niger by the highlands of the Mandingo country. Its general course is NW. and W., through the Senegambia and Niger Territories and the colony of Senegal,—its basin lying N. of that of the Gambia,—and it enters a lagoon of the Atlantic Ocean in lat. 16° N., lon. 16° 33′ W., near the town of Saint-Louis. Total course, estimated at 1000 miles. Its chief affluents are the Falemé, a large and navigable stream, on the W. and the Bakhoi ("white river") on the E., the latter, whose confluence is at Bafulabé, being sometimes considered to be one of the "forks" of the Senegal. The navigation of the Senegal in its upper course is frequently interrupted by vertical falls and cataracts. In the lowlands it is a sluggish stream, whose waters are at times greatly swollen by the rains, and it frequently divides so as to enclose islands. Vessels of moderate draught ascend the river at all seasons from its mouth to the cataract of Felu, SE. of Kayes (up to which point there is regular steamboat navigation), and larger vessels reach the same point at times of flood-water. The Senegal is the first large permanent river of western Africa S. of Morocco.

Senegal (Fr. Sénégal), a French colonial dependency of western Africa, consisting since the decrees of 1902 and 1904, which took from the old colony much of its area and created the Senegambia and Niger Territories, chiefly of the Atlantic coast-strip between lat. 18° N. (the limit being sometimes extended to Cape Blanco) and Portuguese Guinea,—excluding therefrom British Guinea,—and the land immediately adjoining the Senegal on both banks below the junction with the Falemé. It thus includes the districts and surroundings of Saint-Louis, Dakar (the chief port of the colony and the administrative seat of the French colonies of west-central Africa), Gorée, Rufisque, Dagana, Richard Toll, Bakel, etc., and a tract on the lower Casamanza. The region is mostly low, in part infertile, but luxuriantly forested in some sections of the Senegal valley. The climate is subject to a high summer temperature and on the whole is unhealthy, especially so in the coast-strip and near the embouchure of the Senegal. Ground-nuts, millet, maize, cocoanuts, resins, and rubber are among the native products; there are few industries beyond native weaving, the fashioning of gold ornaments, and pottery- and brick-making. The exports are chiefly ground-nuts. A railway 163 miles in length unites Dakar, Rufisque, and Saint-Louis. Capital, Saint-Louis. The colony is represented by a single member in the Chamber of Deputies of France.

Senegambia, sĕn-e-gam'be-ą (Fr. Sénégambie, sā'-nā'gôN'bee'), a name formerly applied to a vast region of western Africa, comprising broadly the lands under French domination between about lat. 8° and 18° N., and having the Sahara on the N., the Sudan on the E. (with no clearly established boundary), the countries of the Guinea coast on the S., and the Atlantic coast on the W. The region thus corresponded virtually to what was until recently Senegal. The major portion of it is to-day part of the newly constituted Senegambia and Niger Territories. See SENEGAL and SENEGAMBIA AND NIGER TERRITORIES.

Senegambia and Niger Territories, a territorial dependency of France, in western equatorial Africa, founded by decrees of 1902 and 1904. They are a geographical hinterland of the colony of Senegal, consisting in major part of that portion of old Senegambia which is not to-day included in Senegal,—i.e., the interior country, excepting a strip on either side of the Senegal River below the Falemé. The Territories are virtually the territories of the Upper Senegal and of the Middle Niger and the Military District. The whole is united under one administrative régime.

Sennaar, or Sennar, sĕn-nār' (also called Dar-Sennaar), a district and officially a province of the Anglo-Egyptian Sudan, lying between the White Nile and Abyssinia and directly E. of Kordofan. The "island of Sennaar," as the region is sometimes designated by the Arabs, lies chiefly in the area between the converging White Nile and the Blue Nile (Bahr-el-Azrek). It is mostly an elevated and partly forest-clad plain, with some exceedingly fertile reaches. In the dry season it has an aspect of dismal sterility. Immediately before and at times during the rains the heat is well-nigh insupportable, rising to 110°–115°. In winter the mercury often drops to 60° and the atmosphere is remarkably free from humidity. The inhabitants are of various shades of complexion from very dark to light, the negro element being dominant. Mohammedanism prevails, with a large admixture of pagan beliefs and practices. A negro kingdom existed here down to 1820, when the country was conquered by Mehemet Ali of Egypt. The chief town is Sennaar.

Servia, sẹr've-ạ (Slavic, Srbiya, sẹr-bee'yâ), a kingdom of Europe, bounded on the N. by the rivers Save and Danube, separating it from the kingdom of Hungary (Slavonia and Hungary proper); on the E. by the Danube, separating it from Rumania and (for the greater part of the distance) Bulgaria; on the SW. by Turkey; and on the W. by Bosnia, from which it is separated in great part by the river Drin. The country lies between the parallels of 42° 20′ and 45° N. lat. Area, 18,630 sq. m. The surface, which has a general slope towards the N., is very mountainous. On the eastern frontier the mountains which form the connecting link between the Carpathians and Balkans rise to an elevation of over 7000 feet above the sea. A southern border-range reaches to about an equal elevation. In the section bordering on Bosnia are mountains about 4000 ft. high. Many deep valleys stretch between the mountain-ranges, through which flow considerable rivers. The principal stream is the Morava, which drains the southern and central parts of the country into the Danube.

The climate of Servia is somewhat rigorous in the more mountainous parts and very mild in the valleys and plains. The average annual precipitation is about 25 inches. The soil of Servia is in general very productive. In spite of the primitive methods of cultivation, bountiful crops of cereals are produced, wheat and Indian corn being the principal grains. The country is a fine fruit region. The plum-orchards are a prominent feature, their enormous product being in great part converted into plum brandy (slivovitz). Much wine is made, and tobacco and hemp are extensively cultivated. Stock-raising is almost as important as agriculture. There are great numbers of horned cattle, sheep, swine, and goats. The pastures are excellent and the forests which clothe the mountain-slopes afford rich nutriment to swine. Silk-worms are extensively reared. The bulk of the agricultural land consists of small holdings, cultivated by peasant proprietors. The Serbs are almost wholly an agricultural and pastoral people. They display, however, great mechanical ability, and, while modern methods of manufacture are but little employed, the products of house industry—textiles and all kinds of metallic and wooden-wares—bear witness to much industrial activity. The mineral products of Servia are diversified, but as yet the total yield is not large. Coal, copper, lead, and antimony are worked, and gold and silver are obtained in small quantities. The sturgeon-fishery is carried on in the Danube and the mountain streams furnish trout. The annual value of the exports of the products of Servia has averaged during the last few years about $14,000,000. The value of the imports is about two-thirds of that of the exports. The foreign trade is mainly with Austria-Hungary, Germany, and Great Britain. The exports include live cattle and hogs, slaughtered hogs, sheepskins, ox-hides, wool, tallow, agricultural produce, fruits, staves, etc.

The government of Servia is a constitutional monarchy, the ministers being responsible to the nation. The legislative power is vested in the Skupshtina (or national assembly), elected by universal suffrage (with a limitation of a tax-qualification). There is a Council of State, one-half of whose members are appointed by the king and one-half by the Skupshtina. The capital of the kingdom is Belgrade. The state religion is the Orthodox Greek church. The archbishop of Belgrade is the primate of the Servian church, to which nearly all the inhabitants of the country belong. The population of Servia at the close of 1900 was 2,493,770. Nearly nine-tenths of the inhabitants are Serbs. There are over 150,000 Rumans and about 45,000 Gypsies. The Jews number only about 5000. The Serbs are a Slavic people, constituting essentially one nationality with the Croats of Austria-Hungary. In their writing they employ the Cyrillic alphabet, while the Croats use the Roman characters. There is an extensive Servian literature. The great mass of the inhabitants of Servia are illiterate. Only a very minute fraction of the inhabitants are sunk in poverty.

Under the Romans Servia was included in the province of Mœsia Superior. The Serbs settled in the region in the seventh century. From the eleventh century there was an independent kingdom of Servia, which reached the height of its power under Stephen Dushan about the middle of the fourteenth century, when it embraced a large part of the Balkan Peninsula. The power of the Serbs was broken by the Turks in the battle of Kossovo in 1389, and in 1459 their realm was incorporated in the Turkish Empire. The little state of Montenegro was an offshoot of the Servian kingdom. Belgrade, which had passed into the possession of Hungary, was taken by the Turks in 1521. Servia was terribly oppressed by the Turks. At the beginning of the nineteenth century the country rose under Czerni (Kara) George, but the sultan succeeded in re-establishing his authority. A fresh rising under Milosh Obrenovitch, initiated in 1815, secured the liberation of the country, which, however, remained in the position of a vassal state of the Turkish Empire, the ruler bearing the title of prince. In 1867 the Turkish garrison in Belgrade was withdrawn. Servia waged war with Turkey in 1876 and 1877–78. The Congress of Berlin in 1878 declared Servia completely independent. In 1882 Milan Obrenovitch assumed the title of king. Servia waged a disastrous war with Bulgaria in 1885. The present dynasty is that of Karageorgevitch.

Seville, se-vill' (Sp. Sevilla, sà-veel'yà; anc. His'palis), a city of Spain, in Andalusia, capital of the province of Seville, on the left bank of the Guadalquivir, about 60 miles NNE. of Cadiz. Lat. 37° 23′ N.; lon. 6° 1′ W. It is practically a seaport, although over 50 miles distant from the ocean, for the tidal Guadalquivir is navigable to this place at high-water by large ships. The city lies in a highly cultivated region, has a delightful climate, and possesses great historic and architectural interest. Although portions have been modernized, Seville wears in great part a characteristically Moorish aspect. The older quarters consist of a maze of tortuous streets and alleys, interspersed with fine squares. In the modern portions there are attractive boulevards. A large part of the dwellings are two-story houses, almost invariably white, enclosing beautiful patios (or courts) adorned with fountains and flowers. The city is embowered in brilliant southern vegetation. Of the great wall which until recently encircled the city only a few of the gateways remain. The principal public places are the shady Alameda de Hércules, adorned with many statues, the Plaza de San Fernando, and the Plaza de Triumfo, flanked by the cathedral, the alcazar, and the Casa Lonja (or exchange). Among the most attractive boulevards are the Paseo de Cristina and the Paseo de las Delicias. The cathedral of Seville is second in size only to St. Peter's in Rome, and is one of the most superb monuments of Gothic architecture. It has splendid stained-glass windows and its chapels are rich storehouses of works of art. This edifice, which was severely damaged by earthquake disturbances in 1899–1900, contains the ashes of Columbus, recently brought hither from Havana. The most striking, as it is the oldest, building of Seville is the Giralda, a square tower over 300 feet high, beautifully proportioned, whose upper part consists of a sixteenth-century belfry and dome, the whole surmounted by a colossal bronze statue of Faith, which serves as a weather-vane. The alcazar, once the palace of the Moorish kings of Seville and afterwards of the Castilian kings, is one of the grandest buildings of the city. Among its most interesting features are a richly decorated façade and beautiful windows, the exquisite Court of the Maidens, the Hall of Charles V., the so-called Dolls' Court, and the chapel of the Catholic kings. It is surrounded by beautiful gardens. Other notable edifices are the superb Casa de Pilatos, in Renaissance style; the palace of Santelmo, the beautiful Casa de Ayuntamiento (town-hall), the Audiencia (Court of Justice), the ancient Torre de Oro ("Golden Tower"), the Casa Lonja (exchange), with a splendid staircase, the churches of San Salvador, San Isidro, San Pedro, San Marcos, and San Lorenzo, several old convents, and the great government tobacco-factory, covering 6 acres. The Provincial Museum contains the largest collection of the works of Murillo, who, as well as Velasquez, was a native of Seville. At the head of the educational institutions of Seville is the university, founded at the beginning of the sixteenth century, and attended by about 1400 students. The provincial library contains 80,000 volumes. The city possesses a provincial school of art; the Columbian Library, founded by Fernando Colón, son of Columbus, and containing numerous manuscripts of the discoverer; and a museum of archæology. A rich collection of Indian archives is housed in the Casa Lonja. The Civil Hospital is one of the largest institutions of the kind in the world. Part of the water-supply of Seville is conveyed through a Roman aqueduct. The bull-ring is, next to that of Madrid, the largest in Spain. In addition to tobacco, the manufactures comprise chocolate, soap, corks, silk, iron-castings, etc. There are celebrated potteries in the suburb of Triana. Seville has a large trade in the products of the region. The city has been the seat of an archbishop since the time of the Visigoths. It is the residence of the captain-general of Andalusia.

The city, under the name of Hispalis, was a place of great importance under the Romans. In the eleventh century there was a flourishing Moorish kingdom of Seville under the Abbadide dynasty, one of the states which arose on the ruins of the caliphate of Cordova. St. Ferdinand of Castile achieved the conquest of the city in 1248 and added it to the Castilian dominions, of which it was long the capital. For a long time after the discovery of America Seville was the leading commercial emporium of Spain. It was finally supplanted by Cadiz and sank into comparative insignificance. Pop. in 1900, 147,271.

Seville, a province of Spain, in Andalusia. Area, 5428 sq. m. It consists in part of a great plain, traversed by the Guadalquivir; but in the N. is the Sierra Morena and in the S. the Sierra de Ronda. Capital, Seville. Pop. in 1900, 555,256.

Shanghai, shäng'hī', a seaport of China, the chief emporium open to European commerce, in the province of Kiang-su, 160 miles ESE. of Nanking. It is situated on the left bank of the Hwang-pu (a tidal water-course), which joins the estuary of the Yang-tse-kiang where that broad channel opens into the sea (about 12 miles from the city), and which below Shanghai is called the Wu-sung-kiang, a name borne by a small stream which here joins the Hwang-pu and is known to foreigners as Soo-chow Creek. Lat. 31° 12′ N.; lon. 121° 28′ E. Shanghai stands on a level and highly cultivated plain, which is intersected by innumerable water-courses. The native town, which is enclosed by a wall, is very small, only about 1 mile in diameter, but immediately outside of it are populous suburbs. It presents an uninviting appearance with its narrow and dirty streets. To the N. and NE. of it is the extensive foreign settlement, with a water-front of over 2 miles. It comprises the British and French concessions and the American quarter. The portion along and near the water presents the aspect of a modern European city with its stately commercial and public edifices, its club-houses, theatres, and newspaper offices, its tramways and electric-lighting, and its wharves and large warehouses. There is a fine bund (or esplanade) along the shore. The foreign settlement is removed from the jurisdiction of the Chinese officials. The foreign population constitutes but a small fraction of its inhabitants. Opposite the British concession is the important commercial and industrial section called Putung, which has ship-building establishments and machine-shops on a large scale. Shanghai ranks among the foremost commercial emporiums of the E. The aggregate value of the imports from foreign countries (including Hong Kong) and exports to foreign countries has risen to over $200,000,000 annually, the commerce increasing from year to year with rapid strides. About three-fourths of all the imports are from the British Isles and British colonies. Only about one-fourth of the exports go to them. The leading imports comprise cotton yarn and cotton stuffs, opium, metals, woollen goods, petroleum, glass, watches, lamps, colors, electrical apparatus, machinery, etc. The native exports comprise raw silk, silk fabrics, tea, cotton, rice, sugar, wool, paper, hides, beans and bean-cake, wheat, etc. There are whole fleets of junks engaged in the coasting trade. The city has a number of establishments connected with the textile industry. A large imperial arsenal is located here. Shanghai was formerly extremely unhealthy, but a great improvement has taken place in the hygienic condition of the foreign section. The climate is characterized by sudden fluctuations of temperature. The population is estimated at about 600,000. About one-half of the inhabitants live within the boundaries of the foreign concessions. The foreign population in 1901 numbered 6774. It is increasing rapidly. Shanghai was opened to foreign commerce in 1842.

Shetland (or Zetland) Islands, a group of some 100 islands in the North Atlantic Ocean, about 55 miles NE. of the Orkney Islands, constituting a county of Scotland. They lie mostly between lat. 59° 51′ and 60° 50′ N. and lon. 0° 44′ and 1° 44′ W. Area, 551 sq. m. Pop. in 1901, 28,166. About 30 of the islands are inhabited. The chief ones are: Mainland, in the SW., which comprises about two-thirds of the entire area; Yell, Unst, Fetlar, Whalsay, Bressay, East and West Barra, Papa-Stour, Foula, and Fair Isle. The coasts are generally bold and precipitous, presenting cliffs broken into the most rugged and fantastic forms, and attaining in the precipice of Foula the height of 1200 feet above the sea. The most elevated point of the island group appears to be Ronas Hill, on Mainland, about 1460 ft. The climate, although not severe, is marked by a low general temperature and by much fog and rain. There is no true tree growth, the vegetation being in the main of lowly bushes, of heaths, mosses, and lichens. Some oats, barley, potatoes, and beets are cultivated. The fisheries (of cod, ling, herring) are fairly extensive, and there is also considerable product from the catch of the whale and seal. Stock-raising (cattle, sheep, and the diminutive horses known as Shetland ponies) is an important occupation with the inhabitants, who also have some manufactures, especially in textiles (hosiery, shawls) woven from the fine wool of the Shetland sheep. The Shetland Islands are conjectured to have been the Ultima Thule of ancient maps. In the Middle Ages the islands were subject to Norway. The Norse tongue lingered on the island of Foula until little more than 100 years ago. Prehistoric antiquities are numerous in the islands. Capital, Lerwick, on Mainland.

Shumla, shoom'lą (Turk. Shumla or Shumna; Bulg. Shumen), a town of Bulgaria, situated amid the northern outliers of the eastern Balkans, 55 miles W. of Varna. It occupies a site at the bottom of an amphitheatre formed by curving heights. Its position is strategically very important, as it is here that the routes from the Danube, proceeding from Silistria and Rustchuk in the direction of Adrianople, find passes over the Balkans, and meet the road from Varna. The town cannot easily be approached by a hostile army except on one side. Under the Turks it was a great stronghold, which repeatedly baffled the attacks of the Russians (1774, 1810, 1828). It remained in the hands of the Turks throughout the war of 1877–78, but at its close it passed out of their possession. More than one-third of the inhabitants are Turks and the numerous mosques are the principal architectural feature of the town. Shumla has an active trade and railway connections. The industries comprise weaving, tanning, the manufacture of metallic wares, etc. The town is the seat of a Greek metropolitan. Pop. in 1901, 22,928.

Siam, sī-am′ (Siam. Muang Thai,—i.e., "land of the free"), a kingdom of southeastern Asia, occupying most of the central part of the Indo-Chinese Peninsula. In addition to the main body of the country, which extends from about lat. 12° to about 20° 30′ N., the dominions of Siam, including the regions over which the king exercises merely a suzerainty, comprise a long, narrow strip reaching far down into the Malay Peninsula, nearly to the parallel of 4° N. lat., known as Lower Siam. Area, estimated at about 220,000 sq. m., more than one-fourth being in the Malay Peninsula. Siam proper is bounded on the N. by the country of the Shans (in Burma and Laos, a division of French Indo-China), on the E. by French Indo-China (Laos and Annam), on the SE. by French Indo-China (Cambodia), on the S. by the Gulf of Siam (an arm of the China Sea), and on the W. by Burma. Lower Siam borders on the British colony of the Straits Settlements and the Federated Malay States. There are a number of islands off the coasts of the Malay Peninsula, the largest being Tantalam, in the China Sea, and Junkseylon, in the Indian Ocean. The river Mekong forms a great part of the boundary between Siam and French Indo-China.

The principal feature of Siam proper is the broad valley of the Menam, the lower part of which is a vast alluvial plain, whose boundless fertility is maintained by the inundations of the river and the great net-work of irrigation canals. This river rises in the mountains in the extreme N. and traverses the country in a southerly direction, emptying into the Gulf of Siam at its head. Its chief tributary is the Me-ping, from the W. The northern part of the country is a mountainous region, and along the W. border extends a range of mountains which attains a height of about 7000 feet. There is a mountainous belt to the E. of the river Menam, at no great distance from it. The remainder of Siam proper is in general a level country (in part a plateau), with some mountains of small elevation. Among the rivers, in addition to the Menam and its tributaries, are the Nam-mun and Nam-si, whose united waters, under the name of Se-mun, flow into the Mekong; the Meklong, which enters the Gulf of Siam to the W. of the Menam; and the Salwin, which flows for some distance along the W. boundary. On the borders of Siam and Cambodia is the large lake Tonlé-Sap (Bien-hoa), abounding in fish. Lower Siam is mostly a mountainous region.

A large part of Siam is covered with forest and jungle. The forests yield teak and other precious woods and various tropical products. Among the fruits of Siam is the delicious mangosteen. The chief agricultural crop is rice, for whose cultivation the periodically inundated lowlands of the Menam are admirably adapted. This constitutes the staple food of the inhabitants. Pepper is an important product. Cotton, tobacco, sugar, and coffee are grown. The mineral wealth of the country, but little developed, includes gold, iron, copper, antimony, zinc, and rubies and sapphires, which are exported in considerable quantities, besides tin, which is mined in the Malay Peninsula. The forests and jungles abound in wild animals, including the elephant (the light-colored variety of which, commonly spoken of as the "white elephant," is held in superstitious veneration), rhinoceros, tiger, leopard, water-buffalo, wild boar, deer, and gibbon. Crocodiles are found. The climate presents a long, wet season in the summer, when the southwest monsoons blow, and a dry season. The difference between the mean temperature of the hottest and coldest months in the lower Menam valley is only about 10°. The population of Siam is variously estimated at between 5,000,000 and 10,000,000. The Siamese, Chinese, and Laotians (whose country, Laos, belongs partly to Siam and partly to French Indo-China) constitute the bulk of the inhabitants. The remainder consists mainly of Peguans, Burmese, Cambodians, and Malays. The Siamese, as well as the Laotians, are Mongolians of the Thai stock. The Siamese language is an Indo-Chinese monosyllabic tongue. There is a large and steady influx of coolies from China, the demand for their labor being great. The capital of the country is Bangkok, near the mouth of the Menam, with a population variously estimated at between 250,000 and 600,000. The former capital of the country, Ayuthia, once a rich city, is situated on the Menam, about 50 miles above Bangkok. Buddhism is the prevailing religion of the country and the state church. Education is almost entirely in the hands of the Buddhist priests. The government maintains at Bangkok several English schools, or schools where English is taught. Slavery exists, but is being gradually abolished. The government of Siam is an absolute monarchy. The king is assisted by a regularly constituted ministry, and there is a legislative council, consisting of ministers of state, active or retired, and a number of men nominated by the sovereign. A notable advance has recently been made in the administration of justice and in the system of police, the government having availed itself of the co-operation of foreigners, especially Englishmen. In general, a considerable improvement is manifest in local administration. There are about forty provinces administered by governors. More than one-half of the territory nominally subject to the king of Siam is included within the British and French "spheres of influence." In the N. are several Laotian states,—Chieng-mai, Nan, Lampun, etc.,—ruled by native princes under control of Siamese commissioners. Lower Siam is occupied by autonomous Malay states, ruled by rajahs, likewise controlled by Siamese commissioners.

The bulk of the exports from Siam consists of rice, the annual shipments of which amount in value to between $15,000,000 and $20,000,000. The next most important article of export is teak, the cutting of which is mainly done by the English, who have a supervision over the forests. Trade and the manufacturing industries are mainly in the hands of the Chinese. Outside of the facilities afforded by the water-ways, the means of communication throughout most of the country are extremely primitive. Recently Siam has embarked upon the construction of railways, of which there are now some hundreds of miles in operation. Telegraphs have been introduced. The capital is passing through a process of modernization, evidenced in electric tramways and electric illumination.

Siam began to enter into relations with the Christian world in the seventeenth century. In the course of the nineteenth century regular diplomatic relations were established with the United States and European nations. In 1893 France forced Siam, by threat of war, to acknowledge the Mekong as the boundary of the French dependencies. By the treaty of 1904 France has come into possession of some Siamese territory on the W. side of the Mekong.

Siberia, sī-bee're-ą (Russ. Sibir, se-bĕĕr'), a vast region in northern Asia, forming part of the Russian Empire, and in its official acceptation comprising all the possessions of Russia in Asia except the Caucasian territories and what is collectively known as Russian Central Asia. Parts of the governments of Perm and Orenburg that lie E. of the Ural Mountains are excluded from this definition. It comprises the governments or provinces of Tobolsk, Tomsk, Yeniseisk, Irkutsk, Yakutsk, Transbaikalia, the Amur, Primorskaya (the Maritime Province), and the island of Saghalin (the southern half ceded to Japan in Sept., 1905). It lies in the main N. of the 50th parallel of N. latitude (reaching in Primorskaya, southward of Vladivostok, nearly to lat. 42° N.), and projects in Cape Tchelyuskin, the most northerly point of the main-land of the eastern hemisphere, to lat. 77° 40′. The E. and W. extent of the land is through 130 degrees of longitude, from the meridian of 59° E. to 169° 40′ W. (190° 20′ E.), at Cape Dezhnev (East Cape). Area, about 4,800,000 sq. m., or nearly three times that of all the non-Russian portion of Europe. The boundaries of this vast region are European Russia on the W., where the low and greatly dismembered and eroded Ural Mountains form a not very prominent boundary for some distance in the NW.; the Arctic Ocean in the N.; Bering Sea and Strait, the Sea of Okhotsk (which cuts off the large peninsula of Kamtchatka), and the Sea of Japan in the NE. and E.; and the Chinese dominions (Manchuria, Mongolia, Kobdo) and Russian Central Asia (Semipalatinsk, Akmolinsk, Turgai) in the S. Much more clearly defined than the Ural Mountains on the W. are the mountains which extend for about three-quarters of the full length of the southern border,—the Altai and Sayan mountains in the W., and the more easterly Yablonoi and Stanovoi mountains, the last-named, stretching from near Transbaikalia to East Cape, being rather a plateau elevation than a mountain-range, with its steeply escarped face looking down upon the region to the S.

Aspect of the Land.—Nearly the whole of Siberia eastward to and for some distance beyond the Lena River is a vast plain, a direct continuation of the plain of Russia, almost without interruptions by hills or mountains of any kind, and falling off gently to the N., where it is continued as a continental shelf or shallow beneath the Arctic Ocean. The land is, in fact, of comparatively recent emergence from the northern sea, to which the greater number of the main rivers direct their courses. Lake Baikal, a relict of the former oceanic basin, and still containing certain forms of marine life identical with or closely related to types still living in the oceanic waters (seals, etc.), lies at an elevation of only 1564 feet above sea-level, although removed from the coast-border by a distance of approximately 1500 miles. In the western part of this vast plain there are large areas of swamp, steppe, and morass, as the Baraba steppe between the Ob and the Irtish, where the general elevation hardly exceeds 300 ft. and where the water-partings or divides are so low that temporary connections between different river-systems are easily effected at times of flood-waters. To the E. of the Lena River a number of broadly parallel mountain elevations or ranges (Verkhoyansk, Kolyma, etc.), trending in a generally N. and S. direction, rise out of the plateau-surface and give to this section of Siberia a mountainous character. The highest known non-volcanic summit of Siberia is the Bielukha ("White") Mountain, in the Great Altai, near the borders of Semipalatinsk, the elevation of which is now thought to be 14,800 ft. It seems not improbable, however, that in the Katunya or Katunsk Mountains, lying to the NW. of Bielukha, and in which the Pillars of the Katunya seemingly rise to 12,790 ft., elevations may be found surpassing that of the White Mountain. Other elevations of from 9000 to 12,000 ft. are found in the Yablonoi and Sayan mountains, and in the Stanovoi the highest points rise above 8000 ft. In the peninsula of Kamtchatka the dominant summits are largely volcanic, a number of more or less active and extinct cones rising to 14,000–15,000 ft. (Kliutchevskaya, active as late as 1854, 15,750 ft.). See KAMTCHATKA.

Rivers.—No country of the world excepting Brazil has so many water-courses of the first magnitude as Siberia, where several of the rivers (Ob, Yenisei, Lena, and Amur) have a length exceeding 2500 miles. On the other hand, with the exception of the Amur, the Siberian rivers are ill adapted for navigation, since they are frozen up during the greater number of months of the year, and their mouths, owing to the presence of Arctic ice, are even in the seasons of heat not readily attainable or passable. Owing to unequal melting of the river-ice, the streams are subject to periodical overflows, which extend far over the bordering land-masses. Steam navigation has been established on the upper and middle courses of some of the major waters and their tributaries,—Ob, Irtish (a tributary of the Ob), Yenisei, Angara (tributary of the Yenisei), Lena, and Amur (from the heart of Transbaikalia completely to its mouth, opposite the island of Saghalin). Other rivers are the Tom, a tributary of the upper Ob; Selenga, a southern feeder of Lake Baikal; Vitim, Olekma, Vilyui, and Aldan, tributaries of the Lena; Yana, Indigirka, and Kolyma; and the Shilka, Argun, and Ussuri, the first two the head-streams and the last-named a large tributary of the Amur. There are few lakes of importance in Siberia, but Lake Baikal, which has the extraordinary depth of 5618 feet,—much the greatest known depth of any lake on the earth's surface,—covers the largest area of any enclosed body of water of Eurasia excepting the Caspian and Aral seas, having nearly 60 times the area of Lake Geneva in Switzerland. The presence of high-level beaches shows that the waters have been receding.

Climate, Vegetable Productions, Animals.—The climate of Siberia is one of accentuated summer heat and winter cold, the latter especially being well emphasized. No statement of average annual temperature gives a proper understanding of the heat conditions of this region. While close to or even beyond the 70° parallel of N. latitude, and directly on the borders of the frozen ocean, a summer (July) reading of 90° in the shade was found by Baron von Toll, the usual winter conditions at Yakutsk, lying S. of the Arctic Circle, and consequently S. of the true Arctic tract, show a winter cold of —60° to —75°; and at the penal settlement of Verkhoyansk, in lat. 67° 32′ N., an extreme of —90° has several times been reported. This central Siberian region seems to have the lowest extreme cold that has at any place been recorded; hence it is called the cold-pole of the globe. In the region about Yakutsk the soil appears to be permanently frozen from a few feet below the surface to several hundreds of feet, and the ground contains many layers of fairly thick and horizontally deposited ice,—believed by some geologists to be relicts of the ice of the Glacial or Great Ice Period. In some parts of Siberia, especially in the E., the atmosphere absorbs comparatively little vapor, and hence there is little precipitation, even the snowfall being so light as to permit of little use of sleds in travelling. The vast northern sections of Siberia, along almost the entire E.–W. extent of the Arctic Ocean, are in the form of tundra, a partially frozen morass or swamp, the continuation of the similarly constructed region of Russia, supporting ordinarily only a lowly growth of moss, lichen, and grass, which is here and there interspersed with a few flowering plants. In some sections the tundra is decked with a myriad of flowers and flowering plants, most pleasing to the eye, and attracting an abundance of animal life. Southward of the zone of tundra (or "barren lands") extends a long belt of woodland, little broken except where water-courses cut their way across, and sweeping over almost the entire E. and W. extent of the land. To this again succeeds the lower or third belt (zone) of vegetation, that of the woodland and forest of the mountain-slopes, continuous with that of Russia, and majestic in its great and sombre solitudes of pine, spruce, oak, maple, beech, birch, and poplar. This is, perhaps, the largest continuous extent of forest land in the world with the exception of the Amazonian forest. Seebach found high timber (conifers) following the courses of some of the river-valleys, as the Yenisei, to the 69th parallel of latitude. The protracted heat of the long summer days develops in many parts of southern Siberia a rapid and luxuriant growth of grasses, and it is found that a fairly large area of the surface can be put to a successful cultivation of the cereals. In 1903, according to a somewhat incomplete report, there were about 8,800,000 acres under crop-cultivation. It is thought that the available agricultural land, most of it in the SW. region, is many times this amount. The crops, in the order of their importance, were hay, wheat, oats, and rye, the wheat having yielded 80,800,000 puds in 1903. The production of hay is very large. Potatoes are extensively cultivated.

The animal life of Siberia is fundamentally that of northern Europe, to which a number of more distinctive Arctic and steppe types are added. The common quadrupeds are the bear (including the Polar bear), glutton, several species of fox, lynx, martin, sable, ermine, wolf, boar, beaver, lemming, and marmot. One or more species of wild equines and several species of deer and antelope are also found. The big-horned sheep (or argali) inhabits some of the mountainous tracts. The reindeer and camel, in their domesticated forms, are largely used in transportation, the camel, of the two-humped (or Bactrian) species, breeding even in the region of Lake Baikal. The tiger, together with the panther, frequently appears in Transbaikalia and is surprisingly abundant in the valley of the Amur. As a member of the Siberian fauna may, perhaps, properly be included the mammoth, which not improbably survived the extinction of its tribe elsewhere, and whose remains are abundantly distributed through the frozen soils of the tundra and the lower river-valleys. The remains of extinct species of rhinoceros, lion, buffalo, and horse, as well as of the mammoth, are found in the late deposits of the New Siberian Islands (Liakhov).

Minerals.—The mineral wealth of Siberia is still largely undeveloped, and mining operations, except in the Ural region, have been but indifferently prosecuted. Gold occurs in gangue and in placer-deposits, the latter being probably distributed over a large part of the surface, and having an origin similar and allied to the deposits of Alaska and the Yukon region. The Ural Mountains have long been worked for gold, silver, lead, copper, and platinum. Other mineral deposits are those of salt, coal, sulphur, chromium, and mercury. Valuable graphite mines have been opened on the lower Yenisei. Among the precious stones the Siberian emeralds and topazes have long been famous.

Population, Towns, Railroads, etc.—The population of Siberia in 1897 was 5,727,090. Over two-thirds of the inhabitants are Russians. The next largest element is that of the Kirghizes. The remainder of the population consists mainly of Buriats (a Mongolian people) and Yakuts (a Turko-Tartaric people). There are also Tunguses, Samoyeds, Ostyaks, etc. Among the more important towns of Siberia are Tomsk, with a population in 1897 of 52,430, the seat of a university; Irkutsk (pop. 51,434), Omsk, Tobolsk, Krasnoyarsk, Yakutsk, Blagovieshtchensk (in the Amur province), and Vladivostok, an important naval station and Pacific port (in Primorskaya). Siberia has the longest continuous line of railway in the world, the Transsiberian, extending from Kurgan, on the Tobol (whence it is in direct continuation with Moscow and St. Petersburg), on the frontier of European Russia, to (after crossing Manchuria) Vladivostok, or over a distance of 4500 miles. The road was begun in 1891 and virtually completed in 1902. A branch of this road extends from Harbin (in Manchuria) to Port Arthur. The full length of line from St. Petersburg to Port Arthur is 5620 miles.

History.—The Russian conquest of Siberia was inaugurated in 1581–82, when the intrepid adventurer, Yermak Timofeyeff, at the head of a small band of Cossacks, took the town of Sibir (Isker), on the river Irtish, the capital of the Tartar khan, Kutchum, and presented a vast territory to the czar. The advance of the Russians was extremely rapid. As early as 1618 they founded the town of Yeniseisk, which became a great centre of the trade between Siberia and Europe. By the end of the seventeenth century they were in possession of Kamtchatka. The territory of the Amur was acquired from China in 1858. Siberia has been used as a place of confinement or banishment for criminals and political offenders. It is estimated that about 150,000 persons belong to these two classes. Deportation has recently been reduced to comparatively small dimensions.

Siberia, a post-village of Mercer co., W.Va. The banking point is Princeton. It has coaling-industries. Pop. about 500.

Sibilla, Monte, mon'tȧ se-bil'lȧ, a summit of the Apennines, in central Italy, in the group of the Sibillini mountains, 26 miles ENE. of Spoleto. Height, 7135 feet.

Sibillini, Monti, a group of the Apennines of central Italy, in Umbria, about 25 miles ENE. of Spoleto. The highest point is Monte Vettore, 8120 feet.

Sibley, a county in the south-central part of Minnesota, has an area of 588 sq. m. It is bounded on the E. by the Minnesota River. Capital, Henderson. Pop. in 1890, 15,199; in 1900, 16,862.

Sibley, a post-village of Dooly co., Ga., on the Georgia Southern and Florida R. The banking point is Cordele. Pop. 100.

Sibley, a banking post-village of Ford co., Ill., on the Wabash R., 8 miles N. of Gibson City. Pop. in 1900, 444.

Sibley, a banking post-town, capital of Osceola co., Iowa, on the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific R. and the Northwestern Line, 74 miles NNE. of Sioux City. Pop. in 1900, 1289.

Sibley, a post-station of Douglas co., Kan.

Sibley, a post-hamlet of Lincoln parish, La.

Sibley, a village of Wayne co., Mich. The banking point is Trenton. Pop. 200.

Sibley, a post-village of Jackson co., Mo., on the S. bank of the Missouri River, about 24 miles ENE. of Kansas City. Pop. about 300.

Siboney, a village of Kiowa co., Okla., on the Frisco System. It has a cotton-gin.

Sibonga, se-bong'gȧ, Philippine Islands: (1) A seaport of the Bucas Islands. It has a good anchorage, a church, and a court-house. (2) A pueblo on the E. coast of Cebú, opposite Bohol Island. Pop. in 1903, 25,848.

Sibuguey (se-boo-gȧ') Peninsula, the great western extension of Mindanao, Philippine Islands. It encloses the extensive Sibuguey Bay.

Sibulán, se-boo-lȧn', a pueblo of East Negros province, Negros, Philippine Islands, opposite the S. extremity of Cebú. Pop. in 1903, 8413.

Sibutu, se-boo'too, an island in the Sea of Celebes, SW. of Tawi-Tawi, Sulu archipelago, to which it belongs. It was annexed by the United States in 1899.

Sibuyán, se-boo-yȧn', an island of the Philippines, 45 miles N. of Panay. The soil is very fertile and yields rice, sugar-cane, pepper, abacá, and cotton.

Sicasica, se`kȧ-see'kȧ, a town of Bolivia, department and 60 miles SSE. of La Paz. It is in a silver-mining region. Elevation, 12,500 feet.

Sichem, see`shŏm', a town of Belgium, in Brabant, on the Demer, 3 miles W. of Diest. Pop. about 3000.

Sicilies, The Two, the name of a former kingdom, comprising southern Italy and Sicily. In the Middle Ages the name "Sicily on this side of the Faro" (i.e., the Strait of Messina) came to be applied to the southern part of the Italian main-land in contradistinction to "Sicily beyond the Faro" (i.e., the island of Sicily). About the middle of the eleventh century the Normans wrested Apulia and Calabria from the Byzantines (Greeks), and before the close of the century they completed the subjugation of Sicily, which had been under the sway of the Saracens. In 1127 the Norman conquests in Italy were united with Sicily and in 1130 the ruler assumed the title of king of Sicily. About this time the territories of the duchy of Naples (founded early in the Middle Ages by the Byzantines) were swallowed up in the possessions of the Normans, whose sway also extended over the dominions of the former principalities of Salerno and Capua. In 1194 the Norman rule in the kingdom of Sicily was succeeded by that of the Hohenstaufen, famous in the annals of the German Empire. In 1266 the Hohenstaufen dynasty was overthrown by the house of Anjou. In 1282 Sicily shook off the yoke of Anjou, southern Italy remaining under the rule of that house as the kingdom of Naples. Sicily placed herself under the rule of Aragon, a connection which was severed in 1296, to be renewed in 1412. Angevine rule in Naples was succeeded in 1442 by that of Aragon. In 1458 Naples again became an independent kingdom. It was momentarily in the possession of the French in 1495; in 1501 it became a joint conquest of France and Aragon, and in 1503 the Spaniards became masters of the whole (Naples and Sicily being now both subject to Ferdinand of Aragon). At the close of the War of the Spanish Succession (1701–13) Spain ceded Sicily to Savoy and Naples to Austria, which power obtained Sicily in 1720 in exchange for Sardinia. Don Carlos of Spain wrested the Two Sicilies from Austria in 1734–35 and inaugurated the Bourbon dynasty. In 1798–99 the French conquered the kingdom of Naples and established the Parthenopean Republic, which was short-lived, the Bourbon king Ferdinand IV. being restored to his throne in the course of 1799. In 1806 Napoleon conquered Naples and placed upon the throne his brother Joseph, who was succeeded in 1808 by Murat. Ferdinand maintained his authority in Sicily, which the French were prevented from seizing by the English, and in 1815 he was restored to the Neapolitan throne. In 1816 he made of Naples and Sicily a consolidated realm, the kingdom of the Two Sicilies, assuming the title of Ferdinand I. In 1860, with the aid of Garibaldi, the Sicilians and Neapolitans rose successfully against the despotic rule of the Bourbons, and in the same year Victor Emmanuel annexed the Two Sicilies. Gaeta, the last stronghold of the Bourbons, fell early in 1861, and immediately after The Two Sicilies became part of the kingdom of Italy. The kingdom of Naples comprised all of continental Italy to the S. of the Papal States. It is now comprised in the compartimenti of Abruzzi e Molise, Campania, Apulia, Basilicate, and Calabria.

Sicily, sis'il-e (It. Sicilia, se-chee'le-å; anc. Sicilia), the largest island of the Mediterranean Sea, forming, with some neighboring isles, a compartimento of the kingdom of Italy. It lies between lat. 36° 38′ and 38° 18′ N., and is separated on the NE. from the Italian main-land by the Strait of Messina, which in its narrowest part is not over 2 miles in width. In shape it is triangular; length, from E. to W., 185 miles; greatest breadth (in the extreme E.), 120 miles. Area, about 9700 sq. m. At the NE. angle is the promontory called Punta del Faro; at the SE. angle, Cape Passaro; and at the W. extremity, Cape Boeo. The most striking feature of Sicily is the volcano of Etna, which towers near the E. coast to a height of about 10,750 feet. The island is covered with mountains. Nearly every portion of the surface is elevated, there being only a few low-lying tracts of any extent, which are situated along the coast, the principal plain being that of Catania, to the S. of Etna. The N. coast presents a bold mountain front as viewed from the water. Near the middle of this coast, a few miles from the shore, is the Pizzo dell' Antenna, in the Madonian range (Le Madonie), the highest peak of the island after Etna, with an elevation of nearly 6500 ft. Rocky cliffs extend along a great part of the E. coast. The island of Sicily is properly a part of the Apennines system of the peninsula of Italy, from which it was separated by a subsidence trough or rift during some portion of the Pliocene period of geological time. In a similar way it was disrupted from the African continuation of the Apennines in Tunis, the Atlas Mountains. The development of volcanic disturbances on and about the island seems to be linked to these crustal movements.

Numerous rivers descend from the mountains. The volume of water in them is small during most of the year and many of them are entirely dry in summer. The largest streams are the Simeto (Giarretta), which waters the plain of Catania, and the Salso, Platani, and Belice, which empty into the sea on the S. coast.

Sicily has for the most part a delightful climate. The heat of the almost rainless summer is not excessive except when for a brief time the hot breath of the sirocco sweeps over the island, and the winters are very mild, snowfalls occurring seldom except on the mountains. The flora of Sicily is extremely rich, presenting a great variety of subtropical forms. Among the characteristic plants are the dwarf palm, date palm, agave, prickly pear, and carob-tree. The banana thrives. The floral landscape presents an endless succession of olive-, orange- and lemon-groves, with plantations of almonds, figs, pomegranates, and pistachios. The highest slopes of the mountains (excepting Etna) are clad with forests consisting of oaks and other trees of the temperate zone, and in the middle and lower slopes there are magnificent growths of chestnut and hazel. The interior of the island is largely a treeless plateau, on which stretch interminable fields of wheat and barley, and whose aspect presents alternately the brilliant verdure of the growing season and a parched and naked landscape. Among the vegetable products of Sicily, in addition to those mentioned, are beans, peas, sumach, flax, tobacco, and licorice. The mulberry is cultivated to a considerable extent. A large part of the agricultural land consists of vast estates cultivated by peasant tenants. Sicily is one of the principal sources of the world's supply of sulphur. Salt is an important product. Amber is found on the coast near Catania. The tunny and anchovy fisheries are on a large scale.

The island is in the main a rural region. It has many towns of considerable size, but few of them have any industrial importance, most of them being merely rural communities. Under the oppressive rule of the Neapolitan kings the island remained materially and intellectually in an extremely backward condition. Much progress has been made since it became a part of the kingdom of Italy. The largest cities and principal seaports are Palermo (the capital), Messina, and Catania. Each of these cities has a university. Other prominent towns are Marsala, Acireale, Trapani, Caltanissetta, Syracuse (Siracusa), Sciacca, and Girgenti. Sicily comprises the provinces of Caltanissetta, Catania, Girgenti, Messina, Palermo, Syracuse, and Trapani. The Sicilian nationality is a very mixed one, the blood of Greeks, Carthaginians, Romans, Arabs, Berbers, Normans, Albanians, and other peoples having been mingled with that of the ancient Siculi. There is a Sicilian dialect of the Italian, which is very distinct from the dialects of the main-land, and which has lent itself to vigorous literary expression. Sicily is a most inviting region for tourists, with its sunny skies and semitropical character, its mountains and its picturesque coasts, its old towns perched on steep heights, and the numerous remains of Greek edifices and feudal castles. Pop. in 1882, 2,927,901; in 1901, 3,529,799; estimated for 1904, 3,647,000.

Sicily was in ancient times the seat of many flourishing Greek colonies, founded between the middle of the eighth century and the close of the first quarter of the sixth century B.C. Among the most celebrated of the Greek cities were Syracuse, Agrigentum, Leontini, Catana, Megara Hyblæa, Gela, Zancle (Messana, Messina), Himera, Mylæ, and Selinus. The island shared fully in the intellectual activity of the Greek world. Carthage extended her dominion into Sicily and sought to conquer the Greek cities, and was partially successful. At the close of the first Punic War (264–241 B.C.) Carthage relinquished Sicily to the Romans, who in 212 B.C. became masters of the island by the conquest of Syracuse. After the fall of the Roman Empire, Sicily came under the sway successively of the Goths, Greek emperors, Saracens, and Normans, who early in the twelfth century established the kingdom of Sicily, which included the southern part of Italy. For the subsequent history of the island, see SICILIES, THE TWO.

Siena, se-ä'nä, often written Sienna (anc. Sena Julia and Colonia Seniensis), a city of Italy, in Tuscany, capital of the province of Siena, situated at an elevation of more than 1000 feet above the sea, between two affluents of the Ombrone, 31 miles SE. of Florence. Siena holds a prominent place in the history of art from the thirteenth century to the sixteenth, ranking only after Rome, Florence, and Venice in importance. Encircled by its old walls, with narrow, winding streets, stately palaces, and splendid churches, it still presents the aspect of a mediæval town. On a height dominating the city rises the thirteenth-century cathedral, with a richly decorated façade of red, white, and black marble, designed by Giovanni Pisano, and with a dome and campanile. The beautiful interior contains an interesting pavement portraying biblical scenes; a famous bronze statue of John the Baptist, by Donatello; and a superb pulpit, in part the work of Niccola Pisano. Other noteworthy ecclesiastical edifices are the fourteenth-century church of San Giovanni, with a handsome though unfinished façade; the church of San Francesco, recently restored, with fine sculptures and paintings; San Domenico, containing the chapel of St. Catherine, with beautiful frescoes; Fontegiusta, with a superb high altar; Degli Innocenti, Sant' Agostino, and San Martino, all rich in works of art; and the oratory of San Bernadino, with paintings by Sodoma. The splendid cathedral library has decorations by Pinturrichio, and a famous antique group of the Graces, brought from Rome. Among the most interesting secular structures are the brick Buonsignori palace in Gothic style; the stately Palazzo del Governo, housing the valuable archives of Siena; the brick Palazzo Publico, dating from the thirteenth century; and the Opera del Duomo, with splendid art collections. The educational institutions of Siena comprise a university, famous in the Middle Ages, but now possessing only the faculties of law and medicine; the Reale Collegio Tolomei, the Institute of Fine Arts, and the public library, containing 75,000 volumes. The town is the seat of an archbishop. Siena has manufactures of textiles and hats. In the latter part of the Middle Ages Siena was one of the most flourishing and powerful of the Italian city republics and is said to have had a population of over 100,000. In the middle of the sixteenth century it was annexed to the Florentine dominions. Pop. in 1901, 28,355.

Siena, a province of Italy, in Tuscany. Area, 1470 sq. m. Capital, Siena. Pop. in 1901, 233,830.

Sierpe, s'yĕR'på, a town of Russian Poland, 21 miles N. of Plock. Pop. in 1897, 8560.

Sierra, se-ĕr'rå, a northeastern county of California, borders on Nevada. Area, 960 sq. m. It is bounded on the S. by the Middle Fork of the Yuba River and is drained by the North Yuba River and by Kanaka and other creeks. It comprises a part of the Sierra Nevada Mountains. The surface is also diversified by the Downieville Buttes, which rise to the height of 8540 feet, and by narrow cañons and ravines of great depth. Gold and silver are found in the county. Capital, Downieville. Pop. in 1890, 5051; in 1900, 4017.

Sierra, a county of southwestern New Mexico, with an area of 3129 sq. m. It is intersected by the Rio Grande. Gold, silver, copper, and lead are found in the county. Capital, Hillsboro. Pop. in 1890, 3630; in 1900, 3158.

Sierra Lanterna, se-ĕr'rȧ lȧn-tĕr'nȧ, a mountain-range in the N. part of New Mexico. Lat. about 36° 20′ N.; lon. 112° 15′ W.

Sierra Leone, se-ĕr'rạ le-o'nee (Sp. pron. se-ĕr'rȧ lȧ-o'nȧ), a British colony on the W. coast of Africa, extending as a narrow border-strip from French Guinea (Rivières du Sud) on the NW. to Liberia on the SE., or over a coast-line of about 180 miles. Area, about 4000 sq. m. Sherboro Island and the Banana, Plantain, and other islets form part of the colony. The coast-line is indented by the broad estuary of the Sherboro, by Yawry Bay, and the estuary called the Sierra Leone River. The surface near the coast, though in some places rocky, is generally flat, but the interior is covered with rugged hills, some of which seem to attain elevations of 2000–3000 feet. The Protectorate of Sierra Leone, which was constituted in 1896, extends inland about 180 miles, and has an area of about 26,000 sq. m. It is well watered by streams (the largest of which are the Great and Little Scarcies, Rokelle, and Jong) whose courses are directed to the Atlantic Ocean.

The climate of Sierra Leone is markedly unhealthy along the coast, and even in the interior it is one of the worst of all Africa. The average annual temperature at Freetown, the capital, is about 80°, and the annual rainfall ranges from 140 to upward of 200 inches. The soil is very fertile, growing excellent crops of rice, maize, yams, plantains, pumpkins, and cassava; sugar, coffee, indigo, ginger, and cotton thrive well. The principal fruits are the cocoanut, banana, pine-apple, orange, lime, guava, papaw, and pomegranate. The forests are extensive, and many of the trees are of gigantic dimensions.

The chief exports are palm oil and kernels, pepper, oil-seed, kola-nuts, rubber, copal, ginger, ground-nuts, hides, ivory, and beeswax. The British colony of Sierra Leone may be said to date from 1787, when the first detachment of fugitive slaves was sent thither by a company formed with the intention of making the region a home for free negroes and proving that colonial products could be raised without slave-labor. Its affairs are administered by a governor, who is assisted by executive and legislative councils. Pop. of the colony in 1901, 76,655, of whom 444 were whites; of the protectorate, estimated at about 1,000,000.

Sierra Leone, Cape, on the W. coast of Africa, at the mouth of the Sierra Leone River.

Sierra Leone River, an estuary of Sierra Leone, about 20 miles in length and from 3 to 8 miles in breadth, joins the Atlantic Ocean immediately N. of the peninsula of Sierra Leone. Its principal branch, the Rokelle, is navigable for about 60 miles.

Sierra Luquillo, se-ĕr'rȧ loo-keel'yo, the central ridge of Porto Rico, runs the whole length of the island, from Cabeza de San Juan to the SW. corner. The highest point is El Yunque, 3678 feet high.

Sierra Madre, se-ĕr'rȧ mȧ'drȧ, the name applied in a rather vague way to the main mountain-masses of Mexico, those which form the eastern and western walls (respectively, Sierra Madre Oriental and Sierra Madre Occidental) of the great central plateau, and which are now known to form integral parts of that plateau, extending in more or less parallel ridges (folds) from its northern to its southern boundaries. These main ridges, composed chiefly of Cretaceous and earlier limestones in the E. and of volcanic rocks in the W., converge, with an accessory western portion, the Sierra Madre Pacífico, to a uniting knot in the state of Oaxaca (the mountain of Zempoaltepec), and are thence continued in one or more branches into Central America. No direct orographic or structural relationship has as yet been established between any of these main ranges and the Andes of South America, nor have the full relations with the mountains of the United States in the N. been determined. There would seem at this time to be no fundamental connection existing between the Sierra Madre Oriental and the true Rocky Mountains, such as is so frequently assumed. The Sierra Madre Oriental rises in its southern parts to 7000–8000 feet, supporting on its exposed flanks and in succeeding zones a luxuriant vegetation of palms, cæsalpinias, melastomes, orchidaceous plants, evergreen-oaks, and conifers. On its crests are implanted some of the giant volcanic cones of the republic (Popocatepetl, Orizaba, Cofre de Perote, etc.). The western Sierra (Occidental) is generally of a more rugged character, being deeply incised by numerous water-ways, and reaches a generally higher elevation (8000–9500 ft.).

Sierra Madre, or Sierra San Juan, a mountain-range of Colorado. See SAGUACHE RANGE.

Sierra Madre, Philippine Islands. See CARABALLOS MOUNTAINS.

Sierra Madre, a post-village of Los Angeles co., Cal. The banking point is Pasadena. It has fruit- and wine-industries. Pop. about 400.

Sierra Maestra, se-ĕr'rȧ mȧ-ȧ'strȧ, or Macaca, mȧ-kȧ'kȧ, a mountain-chain of Cuba, extending along the S. coast from Cape Cruz to Guantánamo; a portion of this range W. of Santiago de Cuba is called Sierra de Cobre (with noted copper-mines). It is very precipitous and heavily wooded and hugs the coast-line. In this range is the Pico Turquino (8400 feet), the highest point in Cuba; other peaks are Ojo del Toro, Gran Piedra, etc. The Sierra Maestra is sometimes considered to include the mountains E. to Cape Maisí; among these is the Yunque ("anvil") de Baracoa, 1825 ft. high.

Sierra Mimbres, se-ĕr'rȧ mim'brĕs, a portion of the Rocky Mountains, in New Mexico, W. of the Rio Grande, between 31° and 35° N. lat. Altitude, 10,060 feet.

Sierra Mojada (mo-hȧ'dȧ), a mountain-range of Mexico, in the western part of the state of Coahuila, near the Bolsón de Mapimi. Height, about 5200 feet. At its northern termination is the small town of Sierra Mojada.

Sierra Morena, se-ĕr'rȧ mo-rȧ'nȧ, a mountain-range or congeries of mountains of Spain, separating the basin of the Guadiana from that of the Guadalquivir and extending from Portugal to about lon. 2° W. It constitutes the southern boundary or wall of the central plateau, above which it generally rises but 1000–1200 feet, and falls abruptly or in a series of well-marked escarpments, on the side of Andalusia, to the deep valley of the Guadalquivir. The mountain association bears numerous local names and merges eastward into the divisions of the coast mountains. One of the highest summits is the Cerro de Almenara, in the extreme E., 5920 feet.

Sierra Morena ("brown range"), Cal., commences about 10 miles S. of San Francisco, and runs through San Francisco co. into Santa Clara co. Height, about 2550 feet.

Sierra Nevada, se-ĕr'rȧ nȧ-vȧ'dȧ ("snowy range"), the highest mountain-range of Spain, extending for about 60 miles in an E. and W. direction through the old kingdom of Granada, and forming part of the great water-shed which separates the waters flowing to the Mediterranean Sea from those flowing to the Atlantic Ocean. Its crest lies only about 25–28 miles from the Mediterranean and the mountains thus rise with marked abruptness. The highest summit is the Mulhacén (Mulahacén), 20 miles SE. of the city of Granada, 11,420 feet,—the loftiest point of the Iberian Peninsula. The second summit is the Picacho de Veleta, 11,385 feet, which overlooks the deep Corral de Veleta and commands one of the finest views in Europe. It carries minor glaciers. The Sierra Nevada, which is covered with snow during most of the year, supports a luxuriant vegetation of olives, chestnuts, and oranges on its southern foot.

Sierra Nevada, se-ĕr'rȧ nạ-vȧ'dȧ, a great mountain-range or buttress of California, mostly in its eastern part, and generally considered to extend from the Tehachapi Pass in the S. (in about lat. 35° 10′ N., where the range is deflected southwestward in the direction of the Coast Range) to Lassen Peak in the N., in lat 40° 35′ N., where its distinctive features are obscured or covered by a continuation of the great lava-fields of Oregon. By some geographers the northern limit is extended to Mount Shasta, beyond which an orographic continuation is found in the Cascade Mountains of Oregon and Washington. The Sierra Nevada is an almost impenetrable buttress over an extent of 400 miles and constitutes the divide between the Great Basin, to which it falls with marked abruptness on the E., and the San Joaquin and Sacramento valleys on the W. It is much more imposing in general character than the true Rocky Mountains of the interior and contains a number of peaks over 13,000 feet in height and a few exceeding 14,000 ft.: Mount Whitney, on the borders of Tulare and Inyo cos., in lat. 36° 36′ N., 14,898 ft.,—considered the loftiest summit of the United States outside of Alaska; Fisherman Peak, 14,448 ft.; Mount Corcoran, 14,093 ft.; Kaweah Peak, 14,000 ft.; Mount Brewer, 13,886 ft.; Mount Lyell, 13,042 (13,217) ft.; Mount Dana, 13,225 (13,000) ft. Structurally the Sierra Nevada is distinguished by its deep and narrow valleys, bounded by almost vertical walls of rock thousands of feet in height and presenting a type of scenery of surpassing grandeur. Such valleys are the Yosemite, the Hetch-hetchy (a short distance N. of the Yosemite), and King's and Tuolumne cañons. Many of the higher summits are covered with perpetual snow and there are a few minor glaciers. The evidences of past glaciation on a vast scale are strongly marked. Much of the region is still densely forested, with giant conifers extending to the 7000–8000-foot level. The Sequoia gigantea is one of its sylvan wonders. The best known passes traversing the mountains are the Truckee in the N., the San Joaquin in the centre, and the Tehachapi in the extreme S. The Sierra Nevada has in its greater part a granitic axial core, which supports marine strata ranging from the Carboniferous to the Cretaceous period, and is seemingly a faulted block of the earth's crust.

Sierra Nevada de Cocuy (or Cocui), a lofty mountain of the Eastern Cordillera of Colombia, in the NW. part of the department of Boyacá. It is the diverging point of the Sierra de Perijá and the Sierra Nevada de Mérida of Venezuela.

Sierra Nevada de Mérida, one of the main stems of the Andes of Venezuela, forming the NE. continuation of the Eastern Cordillera of Colombia, and extending to about lat. 10° N., or beyond Barquisimeto. The loftiest summits are Concha and Coluna, SE. of the town of Mérida, both seemingly about 15,400 feet high.

Silesia, sī-lee′she-ạ (Ger. Schlesien, shlā′ze-ẹn), a province forming the SE. portion of Prussia, bounded on the E. by Russian Poland and Galicia, on the S. and SW. by Austrian Silesia, Moravia, Bohemia, and the kingdom of Saxony, on the NW. by Brandenburg, and on the N. by Posen. Area, 15,558 sq. m. The surface in the S. is mountainous, in other parts generally level or undulating, with areas of elevated plateau. Along the SW. border extend the Sudetic Mountains, whose spurs cover a considerable area. Their highest portion is the Riesengebirge (Giant Mountains), whose loftiest summit, the Schneekoppe (5265 feet), is in Silesia. The Oder traverses the region from SE. to NW., draining nearly the whole of it through its affluents, among which are the two Neisses, Bober, Malapane, and Bartsch. The country to the W. of the Oder is for the most part very fertile, but the other half of the province is on the whole very unproductive. Silesia is one of the granaries of Germany. Large quantities of potatoes are raised and the beet-sugar industry is extensive. The province is rich in cattle. Nearly one-third of the surface is covered with forests, consisting mainly of conifers. The mineral wealth of Silesia is very great. More coal is mined here than in any other province of Prussia except Westphalia, the product in 1901 having reached 30,000,000 long tons. Vast quantities of iron- and zinc-ore are mined and lead is an important product. There are numerous mineral springs, the best known being those of Warmbrunn and Salzbrunn. Manufactures are equally developed with agriculture and mining. The textile industry is on a vast scale. In flax-spinning and linen-weaving Silesia is the foremost section of Germany. The metallic industries are barely inferior to the textile. The district of Oppeln is the principal seat of the iron-industry. There are extensive manufactures of glass, porcelain, and earthenware, chemicals, paper, leather, wooden articles, clothing, etc. Beer and spirits are produced in large quantities.

The population in 1900 was 4,668,857. Three-fourths of the inhabitants are Germans and nearly one-fourth Poles. In 1901 there were 2,569,688 Catholics and 2,042,583 Protestants. The Jews numbered 47,586. The capital of the province is Breslau, which is the seat of a university. Silesia is divided into the 3 government-districts of Breslau, Liegnitz, and Oppeln.

In the latter part of the Middle Ages a host of petty states arose in Silesia, many of them ruled by Polish ducal houses. The country gradually came under the overlordship of the kings of Bohemia, becoming a part of the Holy Roman (German) Empire. As part of the lands of the Bohemian crown it became a possession of the Hapsburg (Austrian) dynasty. In 1740–42 Frederick the Great of Prussia wrested nearly the whole of Silesia from Austria.

Silesia, or Austrian Silesia, a crown-land and duchy of Austria-Hungary, in Cisleithania, comprising a small fragment of old Silesia, the great bulk of which was conquered by Frederick the Great of Prussia in 1740–42. It has Moravia on the SW. and Galicia on the E., and borders for a short distance on Hungary. Area, 1987 sq.m. It belongs in great part to the region of the Sudetic Mountains. The Carpathians extend in the SE. along the Hungarian border. The region is rich in coal. Pop. in 1900, 680,422. Somewhat more than one-half of the inhabitants are Slavs (Poles, Czechs, and Slovaks). The remainder are nearly all Germans. The great bulk of the people are Roman Catholics. Capital, Troppau.

Siletz, a post-village of Lincoln co., Oregon. The banking point is Corvallis. Pop. 100.

Sindh, Sind, or Sinde, a region in the extreme W. part of British India, constituting a province of the presidency of Bombay. It is bounded on the W. and N. by Beluchistan, on the NE. by the Punjab, on the E. by Rajputana, on the S. by the Runn of Cutch, and on the SW. by the Arabian Sea. Its southern extremity is a few miles N. of the Tropic of Cancer. Area, about 53,000 sq. m., of which the native state of Khairpur comprises about 6000 sq. m. Sindh is traversed from N. to S. by the Indus and includes the large delta of that river. The region is mainly a great alluvial plain, with mountains extending along the border of Beluchistan. The coasts are low. The climate is extremely hot and remarkably dry, some sections being practically rainless. Most of the country is a desert, owing mainly to the lack of rainfall. The soil is in great part a fertile clay, baked by the scorching sun, and containing salt or saltpetre. The SE. corner of Sindh is part of the sand desert of Thur (Thar), or the Indian Desert. A narrow belt of alluvial land close to the Indus, in Upper Sindh, is rendered highly productive by numerous irrigation canals and the periodical inundations of the river. The cultivated area embraces somewhat more than one-tenth of the whole area of the region. The products include wheat, barley, rice, millet, and other grains, oil-seeds, hemp, cotton, indigo, opium, tobacco, sugar, and vegetables. Among the domestic animals are large numbers of camels and buffaloes. A railway extends through the valley of the Indus, terminating at the busy port of Kurrachee (Karachi), the outlet of the products of the region. The population of Sindh (excluding Khairpur) in 1901 was 3,210,910. The inhabitants are mainly of Hindu stock, with an admixture of Beluchi blood. There are a large number of Beluchis. The Sindhi language is one of the Aryan Indian tongues, containing numerous Persian and Arabic elements. The prevailing religion is Mohammedanism, the Mohammedans outnumbering the Hindus four to one. Only a small fraction of the inhabitants can read and write. The capital is Kurrachee. Among other towns are Hyderabad, Shikarpur, Rohri, and Sukkur. Sindh passed from the rule of its various emirs to that of the British in 1843.

Smyrna, smûr'nạ (Turk. Izmir, iz-meer′), a seaport of Turkey, on the W. coast of Asia Minor, capital of the vilayet of Aidin (or of Smyrna), at the head of the Gulf of Smyrna, about 200 miles SSW. of Constantinople. Lat. 38° 26′ N.; lon. 27° 9′ E. It is built partly on level ground and partly on the slopes of Mount Pagus, which rises on the SE. to a height of about 450 feet. Smyrna is no longer entirely the Oriental city that it was, a large section along and near the shore now presenting a modernized appearance. The view of the city as seen from the sea is extremely picturesque, with the houses in the background rising in terraces above each other, the churches, gleaming minarets, and dark cypresses standing out above them, and Mount Pagus overtopping all, with the ruins of a mediæval stronghold on its summit. There are five quarters: the Frank (European) quarter, extending along the shore and containing many buildings of a modern type, including hotels; and the Greek, Armenian, Jewish, and Turkish quarters, the last-named occupying in great part the high ground. In the old quarters the streets are very narrow. A fine quay, with a tramway, extends along the water-front. The individual buildings of Smyrna present little of architectural interest. There are a number of schools, as well as hospitals and other benevolent institutions, maintained by the various nationalities. The Museum and Library of the Evangelical School, a Greek foundation, contains a museum of ancient sculptures and a valuable collection of books and manuscripts. The city has modern systems of water-supply and lighting.

Smyrna is the chief seaport of Asiatic Turkey. Its harbor is one of the finest in the Mediterranean. The exports include figs (for which the city is famous), raisins, sponges, Turkey carpets and rugs, valonia, opium, tobacco, silk, licorice-root, wool, hides, emery, leeches, etc. The value of the exports in 1902 was $20,000,000; of the imports, nearly $14,000,000. A large part of the trade is with Great Britain. Smyrna is connected by rail with Constantinople, as well as with Konieh, Angora, and other commercial centres of Asia Minor. The manufacturing industries are on a limited scale. Among the products are textiles, leather, soap, and furniture. There are machine-shops and iron-works. The curing of figs employs many persons and various food-stuffs are made and exported. The population is estimated at about 200,000. The Greeks are nearly as numerous as the Turks, comprising about one-third of the inhabitants. The Jews and Armenians together make up about one-tenth. The ancient Greek city of Smyrna was one of the most flourishing cities of Asia Minor. There are numerous remains of antiquity.

Snake River, a minor stream, having gold-bearing tributaries, in Seward Peninsula, Alaska, and discharging at Nome.

Snake (or Lewis) River (the Shoshone of the aborigines), the largest branch or affluent of the Columbia River, rises, as the South Fork, in the Rocky Mountains divide of northwestern Wyoming, in the southern part of the Yellowstone National Park, flows southward (traversing Jackson Lake), then westward across southern Idaho, and northward along the Oregon boundary, and finally westward in Washington, to discharge into the Columbia River in about lat. 46° 12′ N. and lon. 119° W. Its length is estimated at 900–1000 miles. It traverses a mountainous country, with its bed incised in places to 1000–4000 feet, and largely in vast superimposed sheets of lava. Navigation in these cañon courses, likewise elsewhere, is obstructed by rapids and falls, so that continuous navigation for steamboats can only be had as far as Lewiston, on the Idaho boundary. The largest falls of the river are the SHOSHONE FALLS (which see). The river's largest affluents are the North Fork, Boisé, Salmon, Clearwater, and Palouse rivers, coming from the right, and the Owyhee and Grande Ronde rivers, from the left.

Society Islands, or Tahiti Archipelago (Fr. Archipel de la Société, ar'shee'pĕl' dẹh lȧ so'se-ä'tȧ'), a group of the South Pacific Ocean, belonging to France, and lying broadly between lat. 16° and 18° S. and lon. 148° and 152° 30′ W., immediately W. of the Tuamotu (or Low) Archipelago. The group consists of a great number of islands, arranged mostly in two groups: namely, the Leeward group (or Society Islands proper), of which the principal are Huaheine (Huahine), Raiatea, Tahao and Bora Bora, and the Tahitian (or Windward) group, with Tahiti and Morea (Moorea), and some minor islets. The islands are mostly of volcanic origin, rising, as in Tahiti, to several thousand feet elevation, and are surrounded by coral structures. They have a healthful climate and are densely wooded. The cocoanut, banana, sugar-cane, orange, and vanilla are extensively cultivated. Copra, mother-of-pearl, tropical fruits, cocoanut oil, and a species of edible fungus are the chief exports.

The area of the group is less than 700 sq. m., of which 600 sq. m. are comprised in the island of Tahiti. (See TAHITI.) Pop. in 1897, about 18,000, of which Tahiti numbered 10,300. The archipelago was formerly thickly peopled. The inhabitants are Polynesians of fine physique. The chief town, and seat of the government of French Oceania, is Papeete, on Tahiti, with a population in 1897 of 4282 (2490 French). South Australia, a British colony in Australia, occupying the median position of that island and extending, with what is known as the Northern Territory of South Australia, completely across its N. and S. extent. Its extreme E. and W. boundaries are the meridians of 129° and 141° E. longitude. The southern shore is almost wholly on the Great Australian Bight (with Spencer and St. Vincent gulfs), while the northern is in great part washed by the Gulf of Carpentaria. The colony is bounded on the E. by Queensland, New South Wales, and Victoria, and on the W. by Western Australia. Area, 903,690 sq. m. Pop. in 1901, 362,604, of which number 4096 belonged to the Northern Territory. A large or the greater part of the region is constituted by the vast interior Austral Plain, largely of a desert character, which in a comparatively recent period was covered by lacustrine waters, and at a somewhat earlier date (Tertiary epoch) was seemingly traversed by the sea, separating what is now the continent of Australia into an eastern and a western part. This Austral Plain, which in the southern parts is broken by minor mountain-ranges or hills (Gawler, Stuart, and Flinders ranges), with mounts Lofty (2330 feet) and Razorback (2800 ft.) as the highest elevations, rises in the interior to a plateau of 600–1000 ft. elevation, and contains a number of shallow lakes, partly saline, of interior drainage (Eyre, Torrens, Gairdner, Everard). Lake Amadeus, lying in about lat. 24° 30′ S., has seemingly at times a length of 200 miles. In the Macdonnell and James ranges, in what is known as Larapinta Land, and occupying the nearly true centre of the colony, the height of land seems to attain nearly 5000 ft. The only stream of importance that has a permanent course is the Murray River, which flows through the SE. part.

The climate of South Australia is generally healthful, but marked by a high degree of heat. At Adelaide, where the average annual rainfall is 20–25 inches, the mean daily temperature for the month of January (midsummer) is about 86°, with a maximum of 112°; its mean daily July temperature is 58°, with a minimum of about 35°. At Port Darwin, on the N. coast, where the annual rainfall is about 63 inches, the mean annual temperature is 82°. In many parts of the interior the rainfall is reduced to 10 and 5 inches. Much of the interior is covered by the "mallee" scrub, but in the coast regions, both N. and S., there is a fairly good representation of the varied Australian floras. (For further general characteristics, fauna, flora, geology, of the region, see AUSTRALIA.) The chief agricultural crop of the colony is wheat, the product of which in 1902 was 6,354,912 bushels. Barley and oats are produced in considerably smaller quantities. Gold, silver, and copper are mined to some extent, but the total mineral product in 1902 was less than £500,000. There were, in 1902, 1881 miles of railway in operation. The government of the colony is vested in a governor, appointed by the crown, and a parliament composed of a legislative council and a house of assembly, the former having 18 representatives and the latter 42. The ministry has 4 departments. Capital, Adelaide; of the Northern Territory, Palmerston. The colonization of South Australia by the British was begun in 1836.

South Boundbrook, a post-town of Somerset co., N.J. Pop. in 1900, 883.

South Bradford, a post-village of Steuben co., N.Y., about 22 miles NW. of Elmira. Pop. 100.

South Braintree, a post-village in Braintree township (town), Norfolk co., Mass., on the New York, New Haven and Hartford R., 11 miles S. of Boston. It has manufactures of paper and boots and shoes. Here is the Thayer Academy. Pop. about 2500.

Southbranch, a post-township of Watonwan co., Minn. Pop. in 1900, 552.

Southbranch, a post-village of Somerset co., N.J., on the South Branch of the Raritan River, about 24 miles N. of Trenton. Pop. 100.

Southbranch, a post-station of Bradford co., Pa., 12 miles by rail S. of Towanda.

South Branch, a post-village of Kent co., New Brunswick, 9 miles from Rexton. Pop. 150.

South Branch, a post-village of Colchester co., Nova Scotia, on the South Branch of the river Stewiacke, 6½ miles from upper Stewiacke.

Southbranch Depot, a post-station of Hampshire co., W.Va., on the Baltimore and Ohio R., 17 miles SE. of Cumberland.

South Brewer, a post-village of Penobscot co., Me., on the Maine Central R., 5 miles (direct) S. of Bangor. It has pulp- and paper-mills. The banking point is Bangor. Pop. 1200.

South Brewster, a post-village in Brewster township (town), Barnstable co., Mass., about 86 miles SE. of Boston. Pop. 75.

Southbridge, a banking post-village in Southbridge township (town), Worcester co., Mass., on the Quinebaug River, about 32 miles E. of Springfield, and on the New York,

New Haven and Hartford R. It has manufactures of cottons, optical goods, shoe-knives, general cutlery, shuttles, etc. Pop. of the town in 1900, 10,025.

South Bridgton, a post-village of Cumberland co., Me., about 36 miles NW. of Portland, on the Bridgton and Saco River R. Pop. about 450.

South Brisbane, or Brisbane South, an independent municipality of Queensland, Australia, lying immediately S. of Brisbane, from which it is separated by the Brisbane River. Pop. about 25,000.

South Bristol, a post-village of Lincoln co., Me., on the Atlantic Ocean and on a small islet, about 16 miles ESE. of Bath. Pop. about 400.

South Bristol, a post-township (town) and village of Ontario co., N.Y., about 14 miles from Canandaigua. Pop. of the town in 1900, 1104; of the village, 200.

South Britain, a post-village of New Haven co., Conn., on the Pomeraug River, about 22 miles NW. of New Haven. Pop. about 300.

South Brookfield, a post-village in Brookfield township (town), Madison co., N.Y., on Beaver Creek, about 24 miles S. of Utica. Pop. 160.

South Brooklyn, a village of Cuyahoga co., Ohio, in Brooklyn township. Pop. in 1900, 2343.

South Brooks, a post-village of Waldo co., Me., 8 miles NW. of Belfast. Pop. 110.

South Brooksville, a post-village of Hancock co., Me., on Penobscot Bay, about 16 miles ESE. of Belfast. Pop. 300.

South Brunswick, a township of Middlesex co., N.J. Pop. in 1900, 2337.

South Buffalo, Erie co., N.Y., is a post-substation of the city of Buffalo.

South Buffalo, a township of Armstrong co., Pa. Pop. in 1900, 1365.

South Burlington, a township (town) of Chittenden co., Vt. Pop. in 1900, 971.

Southbury, a post-village in Southbury township (town), New Haven co., Conn., on the Pomeraug River, 10 miles SW. of Waterbury. It has manufactures of farm-implements. Pop. of the town in 1900, 1238.

South Butler, a post-hamlet of Branch co., Mich., 6 miles N. of Quincy.

South Butler, a post-village of Wayne co., N.Y., 44 miles E. of Rochester. Pop. about 350.

South Byfield, a post-hamlet of Essex co., Mass., about 30 miles N. by E. of Boston.

South Byron, a post-village in Byron township (town), Genesee co., N.Y., 7½ miles NE. of Batavia. Pop. about 300.

South Byron, a post-village of Fond du Lac co., Wis., on the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul R. The banking point is Fond du Lac.

South Cabot, a post-village of Washington co., Vt., about 22 miles ENE. of Montpelier. Pop. 70.

South Cairo (kā'ro), a post-village in Cairo township (town), Greene co., N.Y., on Catskill Creek, about 11 miles W. by N. of Hudson. Pop. 100.

South Cambridge, a post-village of Washington co., N.Y., on the Greenwich and Johnsonville R., 28 miles NNE. of Albany. Pop. 200.

South Camden, a post-hamlet of Hillsdale co., Mich., 47 miles SSW. of Jackson.

South Canaan, a post-village of Litchfield co., Conn. See FALLS VILLAGE.

South Canaan, a post-village in South Canaan township, Wayne co., Pa., about 12 miles SW. of Honesdale. Pop. of the township in 1900, 1039; of the village, 250.

South Canara, or Kanara (kän'ä-rä), a district of India, in Madras, on the Malabar Coast, bordering on Mysore and Coorg. Capital, Mangalore.

South Canisteo, a post-hamlet of Steuben co., N.Y.

South Canonsburg, a borough of Washington co., Pa. Pop. in 1900, 610.

South Canterbury, a post-station of Windham co., Conn., on the Quinebaug River, 12 miles NE. of Norwich.

South Canyon City, a city of Fremont co., Colo. Pop. in 1900, 958.

South Cape, the southernmost point of Tasmania, in lat. 43° 40′ S.

South Cape May, a borough of Cape May co., N.J. Pop. in 1900, 14.

South Carolina, one of the South Atlantic States, and one of the original thirteen members of the American Union, bounded N. and NE. by North Carolina, SE. by the Atlantic Ocean, and SW. by Georgia, and lying between lat. 32° 2′ and 35° 17′ N. It is separated from Georgia by the Savannah and Chattooga rivers, and is of roughly triangular outline. Area, 30,570 sq. m., of which 400 sq. m. cover water-surfaces.

Face of the Country.—Off the coast, mainly to the SW. of Charleston, lie the flat and low sea-islands, separated from the main-land and from one another by a series of shallow sounds and inlets. For about 100 miles inland from the coast the country is level and sandy, covered mainly with pine forests, with occasional rice-swamps. The next belt is the sand-hill country, along whose upper border runs "the ridge," above which the country is beautifully diversified, rising gradually in the NW. to the Blue Ridge, which attains an elevation of upward of 3500 feet. Some of the more prominent summits are Rich Mountain, 3569 ft.; Mount Pinnacle, 3436 ft.; Table Rock, 3124 ft.; and Cæsar's Head, 3225 ft.

Coast-Line and Rivers.—From Little River Inlet to the Savannah River the coast extends 200 miles in a SW. course. Winyaw Bay, Bull's Bay, Charleston Harbor, Stono Inlet, Edisto Inlet, St. Helena Sound, and Port Royal Sound afford harbor facilities, but the only first-class harbors are those of Charleston and Port Royal, on the latter of which are the towns of Beaufort and Hilton Head. The chief rivers of South Carolina are the Great Pedee, Santee, and Savannah (on the border). The Savannah River is navigable for steamboats to Augusta, Ga., and much higher by small boats. The rivers Ashley and Cooper flow into Charleston Harbor. The Santee, with its constituent streams the Congaree and Wateree, affords steam-navigation to Columbia and Camden. The Great Pedee is navigable for a distance of over 100 miles. The Combahee and Edisto admit of some navigation. Inside the sea-islands the sounds afford a safe and tranquil passage for river-steamers. The Cooper and Santee rivers are connected by the Santee Canal.

Geology.—The upper half of South Carolina is mainly Archæan, but along the SE. border of the hilly region there are several detached areas of considerable size which are referable to the Cambrian or Silurian, and upon this older Paleozoic formation rest in places small areas of the Triassic. The level pine woods and coast-lands are Tertiary and Quaternary, with occasional exposures of the Cretaceous, as along the Great and Little Pedee rivers, etc. Among the mineral treasures of the state are gold (found in several of the NW. counties, in veins, nuggets, and gravel); silver, ores of iron, manganese, copper, and lead, chiefly northwestward; abundance of kaolin, red and yellow ochres, buhr-stone, and shales suitable for flagging; red, white, and variegated granites and syenites; marbles, limestones, soapstones, etc. The Trias affords a little coal and some graphite. The quantity of gold mined in 1903 was 4872 fine ounces, valued at $100,700; of silver, 300 fine ounces, valued at $162. The mineral of greatest economic importance is the (Post-Pliocene) phosphate lime-rock of the low-land and river-beds near Charleston, and also on the Stono, Ashepoo, and Edisto rivers, and near St. Helena Sound. The product of this fertilizer in 1903 was 258,000 tons, valued at $783,800. The granite industry is important. The value of this rock quarried in 1903 was $476,863 ($996,084 in 1901).

Agriculture and Natural Products.—The sea-islands are specially adapted to the growth of long-staple or sea-island cotton and of rice; the tidal swamps, to rice-culture; the inland swamps, when drained, to corn, cotton, rice, and peas; the oak-and-pine and the oak-and-hickory lands, to corn and cotton. The pine barrens now afford principally naval stores, as well as fruits and vegetables, and give good pasturage. The northwestern region produces corn, wheat, barley, oats, tobacco, and a great variety of fruits, including apples, pears, and plums. The fig and pomegranate thrive in the lower counties and the peach and grape flourish everywhere. Cotton constitutes the most important crop of South Carolina. The number of bales produced in 1900 was 881,422. It is also a leading state in the cultivation of rice. The other chief agricultural crops in 1900 were: corn, 13,129,137 bushels; wheat, 2,142,828 bushels; oats, 4,023,149 bushels; rye, 29,265 bushels; potatoes, 335,946 bushels; and hay, 192,453 tons. Stock-raising and wool-growing are carried on with profit. The native forest trees include several oaks, of which one is the very valuable evergreen or live oak, the long-leaf and other useful pines, several hickories, and many other important timber-trees. The palmetto is a characteristic plant of the lowlands.

The climate of the pines and of the sand-hill belt is very dry and equable and is thought to exercise a curative influence upon those afflicted with pulmonary disease. The coast-region was formerly visited by epidemics of yellow fever and malarial tracts are found in the rice-swamps. The mountain-region has a delightful summer climate and is much visited by tourists. Aiken, which enjoys a dry and equable climate, is one of the most noted of the health-resorts of the Union. The mean temperature for the month of January is about 45°, for July 80° (with a maximum summer heat of 105°). The average annual rainfall is between 40 and 48 inches. South Carolina was visited by a disastrous earthquake in 1886, which wrecked a large part of the city of Charleston.

Manufactures.—The manufacture of cotton is by far the most important manufacturing industry of the state and in 1900 yielded a product valued at $29,723,919. Second in rank is the manufacture of lumber and timber products, which were valued at $5,207,184. The manufacture of woollens, cotton-seed oil and oil-cake, and of phosphates (from the rock deposit already mentioned), flouring, rice-hulling, and the tanning and currying of leather are industries of considerable importance.

Railroads.—The first railroad in the state, the South Carolina R., was built in 1830–33. In 1850 the state had 250 miles of railroad; in 1860, 973 miles; in 1870, 1139 miles; in 1880, 1429 miles; in 1890, 2297 miles; and in 1900, 2830 miles.

Education.—The leading educational institutions of the state comprise South Carolina College, located at Columbia; the College of Charleston and the South Carolina Military Academy, at Charleston; Furman University, at Greenville; Wofford and Converse Colleges, at Spartanburg; Newberry College, at Newberry; Clemson (Agricultural) College, at Clemson College; Winthrop College, at Rock Hill; Lander College, at Greenwood; Erskine College, at Duewest; Greenville Female College and the Greenville College for Women; Claflin University (for colored), at Orangeburg; Schofield Normal and Industrial School, at Aiken; and various schools of a denominational character.

Counties and Cities.—The counties (formerly districts) are 40 in number,—viz., Abbeville, Aiken, Anderson, Bamberg, Barnwell, Beaufort, Berkeley, Charleston, Cherokee, Chester, Chesterfield, Clarendon, Colleton, Darlington, Dorchester, Edgefield, Fairfield, Florence, Georgetown, Greenville, Greenwood, Hampton, Horry, Kershaw, Lancaster, Laurens, Lexington, Marion, Marlboro, Newberry, Oconee, Orangeburg, Pickens, Richland, Saluda, Spartanburg, Sumter, Union, Williamsburg, and York. The principal cities are Charleston (pop. in 1900, 55,807); Columbia, the capital (21,108); Greenville (11,860); Spartanburg (11,395); Anderson (5498); Rock Hill (5485); Sumter (5673); Union, Beaufort, and Camden.

Government, etc.—The governor and other state officers are chosen for the term of 2 years. The legislature consists of a senate and a house of representatives, the members of the former being elected for 4 years and those of the latter for 2 years. The state sends 7 representatives to the lower house of the national Congress.

The population in 1790 was 249,073; in 1800, 345,591; in 1810, 415,115; in 1820, 502,741; in 1830, 581,185; in 1840, 594,398; in 1850, 668,507; in 1860, 703,708; in 1870, 705,606; in 1880, 995,577; in 1890, 1,151,149; and in 1900, 1,340,316. The negro population in 1900 numbered 782,321. The foreign-born population in that year was only 5528.

History.—The first attempt to plant a European colony in South Carolina was made in 1562, when Jean Ribaut (Ribault), acting for Coligny, established a settlement at Port Royal. This was broken up in the following year. In 1663 the province of Carolina was granted by Charles II. to a number of lords proprietors. It was divided into two parts, North Carolina and South Carolina. The philosopher Locke drew up for Carolina a constitution, with an aristocracy of landgraves and caciques, a scheme too fantastic and ill-suited to the needs of the settlers to admit of being put into effective operation. By the close of the seventeenth century there were several thousand colonists of various nationalities within the limits of the present state, and Charleston was a flourishing little town. In 1729 South and North Carolina were constituted royal provinces. South Carolina was in the van of the colonies in the revolutionary movement. In 1775 her governor abandoned his province, and in 1776 a state government was organized. The region was an important field of operations in the war for independence. The year 1832 witnessed the Nullification movement in South Carolina, an assertion of state rights against the power of the federal government. The state initiated the secession movement in Dec., 1860, and the bombardment of Fort Sumter, Charleston harbor, in April, 1861, was the first act of the Civil War. The reconstruction of the state was completed in 1868.

South Carrollton, a banking post-town of Muhlenberg co., Ky., on the Louisville and Nashville R., 32 miles S. of Owensboro. Pop. in 1900, 452.

South Carthage, a post-hamlet of Franklin co., Me., about 40 miles WNW. of Augusta.

South Carver, a post-village in Carver township (town), Plymouth co., Mass., 38 miles SSE. of Boston. It has an iron-foundry established in 1757. Pop. about 450.

South Casco, a post-village of Cumberland co., Me., on Sebago Lake, about 24 miles NNW. of Portland. Pop. 100.

South Cedar, a post-station of Jackson co., Kan.

South Centerville, a post-village of Orange co., N.Y.

South Charleston, a banking post-village of Clark co., Ohio, on the Detroit Southern and the Pittsburg, Cincinnati, Chicago and St. Louis Rs., 36 miles WSW. of Columbus. Pop. in 1900, 1096.

South Charlestown, a post-village in Charlestown township (town), Sullivan co., N.H., on the Connecticut River and on the Boston and Maine R., 4 miles N. of Bellows Falls. Pop. 75.

South Chatham, a post-village in Chatham township (town), Barnstable co., Mass., on the Atlantic Ocean and on the New York, New Haven and Hartford R., about 52 miles E. of New Bedford. Pop. about 400.

South Chatham, a post-village in Chatham township (town), Carroll co., N.H., 7 miles NW. of Fryeburg, Me.

South Chelmsford (chĕmz'fȯrd), a post-village of Middlesex co., Mass., in Chelmsford township (town), on the New York, New Haven and Hartford R., 6 miles SSW. of Lowell.

South Chesterville, a post-village of Franklin co., Me., 20 miles NW. of Augusta.

South Chicago, a post-substation of Chicago, Ill.

South China, a post-village of Kennebec co., Me., on China Lake, 12 miles ENE. of Augusta. Pop. about 300.

South Colton, a post-village in Colton township (town), St. Lawrence co., N.Y., on the Raquette River, about 15 miles ESE. of Canton. Pop. 225.

South Columbia, a post-village of Coos co., N.H., on the Connecticut River, about 25 miles N. by E. of Lancaster.

South Columbia, a post-village of Herkimer co., N.Y., on the Lackawanna R., 3 miles N. of Richfield Springs. Pop. 100.

South Corinth, a post-village of Penobscot co., Me., 15½ miles NW. of Bangor. Pop. 125.

South Corinth, a post-village in Corinth township (town), Saratoga co., N.Y., on the Delaware and Hudson R., 13 miles N. of Saratoga Springs. Pop. 200.

South Cornish, a post-village of Sullivan co., N.H. Pop. 100.

South Cortland, a post-village of Cortland co., N.Y., on the Lehigh Valley R., 3 miles SW. of Cortland. Pop. 100.

South Coventry, a post-village in Coventry township (town), Tolland co., Conn., near the Willimantic River, on the Central Vermont R., and 24 miles E. of Hartford. It has silk- and paper-mills. The banking point is Willimantic. Pop. about 1000.

South Coventry, a township of Chester co., Pa. Pop. in 1900, 421.

Southcreek, a post-village of Beaufort co., N.C. The banking point is Washington. Pop. 150.

South Creek, a township of Bradford co., Pa., about 12 miles S. of Elmira, N.Y. Pop. in 1900, 900.

South Crosland, a town of England, in Yorkshire, 3 miles from Huddersfield. Pop. in 1901, 2974.

South Cushing, a post-village of Knox co., Me. The banking point is Thomaston. Pop. 150.

South Cuyler (kī'lẽr), a post-village of Cortland co., N.Y., about 45 miles SW. of Utica. Pop. 150.

South Dakota, a northwestern state of the American Union, bounded on the N. by North Dakota, on the E. by Minnesota (from which it is in part separated by Lake Traverse and Big Stone Lake) and by Iowa (from which it is mainly parted by the Big Sioux River) on the S. by Nebraska (with the line of division formed by the Missouri River and the parallel of 43° N. lat.), and on the W. by Montana and Wyoming (the meridian of 104° W. lon. constituting the boundary). Area of the land-surface, 76,850 sq. m.; of the appertaining waters, 800 sq. m.

Topography and Drainage.—South Dakota is comprised within the region of the Great Plains, and is in the main a plateau of moderate elevation, rising from the E. border (where it has a general height of about 1100–1300 feet) westward, where the elevation exceeds 3000 ft. The altitude of Lake Traverse is about 975 ft. The surface is divided into two nearly equal sections by the Missouri River, which enters the state from North Dakota and, after crossing it in a southeasterly direction, forms a part of the southern boundary. E. of the Missouri, level and rolling prairie lands predominate. The Plateau du Coteau du Missouri, which follows the eastern bank of the river in its passage across North Dakota, extends southward into this state. Along the eastern border-line there extends N. and S. for about 200 miles a long narrow plateau known as the Coteau des Prairies. Throughout this latter elevated region there are numerous small salt lakes without outlets. Between these two plateaus is the narrow valley of the James (or Dakota) River. W. of the Missouri the plain is more uneven, the hills and buttes are more numerous, and the elevated region finally culminates towards the SW. in the Black Hills. This is a rugged region of upheaval, covering an area of 3500 sq. m. or more within this state and extending into Wyoming. This district has a general elevation of 4000 feet above the sea, and Harney Peak, the highest point, reaches an altitude of 7216 ft. SE. of the Black Hills are the Bad Lands, or Mauvaises Terres of the early French settlers. Although this portion of the state is usually described as barren and useless land, its cañons and some of the level tracts contain a rich growth of vegetation which has to some extent been utilized for grazing. The name "bad lands" was originally applied to the region to designate the difficulty of travel over it, and had no reference to its scanty vegetable covering. The central and western portions of the state are drained by the Missouri and its tributaries, of which the most important are the Grand, the Moreau, Big Cheyenne, Bad, and White rivers. The eastern part lies mainly in the valleys of the James and Big Sioux rivers, which are also affluents of the Missouri. Among the lofty elevations of the state are Crook Tower, 7140 ft., Warren Peak, 6900 ft., and Terry Peak, 7070 ft.

Geology and Minerals.—The greater part of the state is of Cretaceous formation, covered throughout the E. and in some parts of the western Missouri Valley by glacial drift. In the S. and SW. is a large area of Tertiary deposits extending southward into Nebraska and Kansas, and westward into Wyoming. In the Black Hills there are exposures of many geological periods, which have been domed up by the granitic and volcanic core of the central (nuclear) mass. The ores found here are of great variety and importance, comprising gold, silver, copper, lead, and tin. In many cases erosion has been so complete as to form rich placer deposits in the valleys and cañons. (See BLACK HILLS.) The gold (nearly all quartz) mined in 1903 was 339,803 fine ounces, valued at $6,826,700; of silver, 270,000. The deposits of tin (at Harney Peak and W. of Deadwood) are among the most valuable in America. Large tracts of country W. of the Missouri are underlaid with lignite, and coal of excellent quality has been discovered in the vicinity of the Black Hills and elsewhere. Natural gas and petroleum are also found. Mica has been mined on a large scale in the Black Hills. Clays, lime, cement, chalk, and building-stones are abundant. The quartzite or jasper granite of the Big Sioux Valley is famous. The grotesquely-shaped Cretaceous rocks of the Bad Lands abound in interesting fossils, which have been extensively collected in scientific surveys.

Climate.—South Dakota enjoys a dry, bracing climate, with comparatively mild winters, in which even extreme cold is much less noticeable, on account of the dryness of the atmosphere, than in the eastern states which lie in the same latitude. The range of temperature is, however, extreme, varying from about —40° in the coldest month to 110° or more in the summer. The warm Chinook winds have a moderating effect upon the general winter temperatures. The rainfall is commonly sufficient for the development of the crops, but on account of occasional droughts, a system of artificial irrigation is in some parts necessary. The average annual rainfall varies from 30–40 inches in the eastern section to 15 inches or less in the W.

Agriculture, etc.—The natural productions are numerous and varied. In most sections of the state the soil is remarkably fertile and agriculture is the leading industry. Wheat and corn are the staple crops, and the quality of the wheat has a world-wide reputation. In the S. corn is the important crop. Flax, oats, barley, hay, and sorghum are also among the valuable products. The leading agricultural crops in 1901 were: corn, 32,418,819 bushels; wheat, 20,149,684 bushels; oats, 12,653,266 bushels; barley, 1,543,571 bushels; rye, 27,804 bushels; potatoes, 4,030,841 bushels; and hay, 2,064,196 tons. Garden vegetables and fruits of various kinds are extensively cultivated. Stock-raising is profitable in all parts of the state. The ease with which corn is raised makes the rearing of hogs a remunerative industry. The quantity of washed and unwashed wool obtained from the wool-clip of 1900 was 2,422,661 pounds.

Railroads.—A great factor in the growth of the Dakotas has been the facility for transportation afforded by the railroads. Many of the roads were constructed in advance of settlement. In 1890 South Dakota had 2610 miles of railroad; in 1900, 2950 miles.

Education.—Among the institutions of higher education are the state university at Vermilion, the Dakota University at Mitchell, the Yankton College, the agricultural college at Brookings, the normal schools at Spearfish, Springfield, and Madison, the school of mines at Rapid City, and a school for deaf-mutes at Sioux Falls. There are other colleges, academies, and institutions of higher learning under denominational control. The state supports a hospital for the insane at Yankton and a soldiers' home at Hot Springs. The state penitentiary is located at Sioux Falls, and there is a reform school at Plankinton.

Counties and Towns.—South Dakota had in 1900 63 counties,—viz., Armstrong, Aurora, Beadle, Bonhomme, Boreman, Brookings, Brown, Brulé, Buffalo, Butte, Campbell, Charles Mix, Clark, Clay, Codington, Custer, Davison, Day, Deuel, Dewey, Douglas, Edmunds, Fall River, Faulk, Grant, Gregory, Hamlin, Hand, Hanson, Hughes, Hutchinson, Hyde, Jerauld, Kingsbury, Lake, Lawrence, Lincoln, Lugenbeel, Lyman, McCook, McPherson, Marshall, Meade, Meyer, Miner, Minnehaha, Moody, Pennington, Potter, Roberts, Sanborn, Schnasse, Shannon, Spink, Stanley, Sully, Tripp, Turner, Union, Walworth, Washabaugh, Washington, and Yankton. Jackson, Pratt, Presho, Sterling, and Todd counties have been organized since the census. The Pine Ridge, Cheyenne River, Rosebud, Standing Rock, Sisseton, and Wahpeton Indian reservations are in this state. The principal towns are Sioux Falls (pop. in 1900, 10,266); Pierre, the capital (2306); Lead (6210); Yankton (4125); Aberdeen (4087); Mitchell (4055); Deadwood (3498); and Watertown.

Government, etc.—The governor and other state officers are elected for 2 years. The legislature consists of a senate and a house of representatives, the members of both serving for 2 years. South Dakota sends 2 members to the lower house of the national Congress.

History, Population.—South Dakota, as well as North Dakota, was included in the Louisiana purchase of 1803. In 1861, Dakota Territory was organized, including a great part of what now constitutes the states of Montana and Wyoming, in addition to North and South Dakota. The entire white population at that time was less than 3000. In 1868 the area of the territory was much reduced. The population increased to 12,887 in 1870. The discovery of gold in the Black Hills and the opening of the farming lands caused such a growth that the census of 1880 showed a population of 135,180. In 1889 North and South Dakota were admitted as states into the Union.

The population of South Dakota in 1890, was 328,808; in 1900, 401,570, including 88,508 foreign-born.

South Danbury, a post-village of Merrimack co., N.H., on the Boston and Maine R., 35 miles NW. of Concord. Pop. 200.

South Danby, a post-village of Tompkins co., N.Y., about 24 miles NE. of Elmira. Pop. 200.

South Dansville, a post-village of Steuben co., N.Y. The banking point is Dansville. Pop. 200.

South Danville, a village of Vermilion co., Ill., in Danville township. Pop. in 1900, 898.

South Danville, a post-village of Androscoggin co., Me.

South Danville, a post-village of Rockingham co., N.H. The banking point is Haverhill, Mass. Pop. 200.

South Danville, a post-village of Caledonia co., Vt., in Danville township (town), 6 miles SW. of St. Johnsbury.

South Darley, a village of Derbyshire, England. Pop. in 1901, 788.

Spaichingen, spī'king-ẹn, a town of Württemberg, 22 miles W. of Sigmaringen. Pop. about 2500.

Spain (Sp. España, ĕs-pȧn'yȧ; L. Hispania; Fr. Espagne, ĕs'pȧñ'; It. Spagna, spȧn'yȧ; Ger. Spanien, spȧ'ne-en), a kingdom in the extreme SW. part of Europe, comprising by far the greater part of the Iberian Peninsula. The Balearic and Canary islands are officially included among the provinces of the Spanish kingdom, and some small possessions on the coast of Morocco are considered part of it. Continental Spain has an area of 190,000 sq. m., and lies between lat. 36° (Punta Marroquí or Cape Tarifa) and 43° 48′ N. and lon. 9° 20′ W. (Cape Toriñana) and 3° 19′ E. (Cape Creus). It is bounded on the N. by the Bay of Biscay and France, E. and S. by the Mediterranean Sea, and W. by Portugal and the Atlantic Ocean. The lofty mountain-mass of the Pyrenees forms the entire boundary with France (a number of the loftier summits being in French territory). On the extreme S. the Strait of Gibraltar, in its narrowest part about 9 miles wide, separates the kingdom from Africa (Morocco). Within the territorial limits of Spain are included the English possession of Gibraltar in the S. and the republic of Andorra (in part) in the N.

The coast-line, which has an estimated length of some 1400 miles, is in general but little indented,—the major indentations being the Gulf of Valencia in the E. and the Gulf of Cadiz in the SW.,—but it is projected into a number of abrupt or sharp promontories, such as capes Finisterre and Ortegal in the NW., Cape Creus (Creux) in the NE., capes Tortosa and Nao in the E., Palos and Gata in the SE., Tarifa in the S., and Trafalgar in the SW.

Relief of the Land.—The major part of Spain consists of a series of moderately elevated plateaus, which together constitute the so-called Meseta, or ancient nuclear buttress of the land, and from which, irregularly dividing it, rise the individual mountain-ranges known under the names of Sierra de Guadarrama (N. and NE. of Madrid), with the Pico de la Peñalara, as its culminating point, about 7900 (8700?) feet; Sierra de Gredos, a southwesterly continuation of the Guadarrama mountains, with the Plaza de Almanzór, 8700 ft.; Sierra de Gata, extending to the frontier of Portugal; the Montes de Toledo, 4750 ft.; and the more extensive and more complicated Sierra Morena (with the Sierra de Córdoba, Cerro de Almenara, 5920 ft., etc., as minor subdivisions) in the S. The last-named is largely the "downfall" or escarpment of the central plateau.

The meseta, which bears evidence of having been recently and in greater part covered by lacustrine waters, has a general elevation of 2000–3000 feet, and occupies with its mountain-spurs virtually the entire region between the Guadalquivir and the Pyrenees and Cantabrian Mountains, corresponding largely to the old divisions of León, Old and New Castile, Aragon, La Mancha, and Estremadura. North of the meseta are the Pyrenees (Maladetta or Pic Nethou, the culminating point, situated on the border-line with France, 11,165 ft.; Mont Perdu, also on the French border, 10,994 ft.; Pic des Possets, 11,045 ft.), and their westerly orographic continuation, the Cantabrian Mountains (Peñas de Europa, 8745 ft.). (See PYRENEES and CANTABRIAN MOUNTAINS.) The mountains S. of the Guadalquivir are chiefly those of Andalusia and Granada, and include the Sierra Nevada (with the Mulahacén, SE. of the city of Granada, the culminating point of all western Europe outside of the Alps, 11,420 ft.) and the more westerly Sierra de Ronda, the latter manifestly a continuation of the mountains of Morocco, the termini being the Rock of Gibraltar (1396 ft.) on the Spanish side and the Jebel-Musa on the African.

The mountains of Spain lack almost wholly the grand majesty of the Alps. The snow and ice mantle is ordinarily of but feeble development, if at all existing throughout the year; there are no glaciers of even second magnitude, and lakes are practically entirely wanting. The central meseta has in general a bleak and forbidding aspect, much resembling the more desolate plains of the western United States, with its buttes and carved escarpments, gaudily-colored cliffs, and dry water-courses. The condition of extensive deforestation, as the result of which over large areas hardly more than the lining vegetation of poplar and other dwarfed trees along river banks and a scanty herbage are to be seen, is responsible in greater part for this dreary appearance.

The principal rivers of Spain flowing directly into the sea are, from N. to S., the Ter, Llobregat, Ebro, Guadalaviar, Júcar, and Segura, flowing E. to the Mediterranean, and the Minho, Douro (Duero), Tagus (Tajo), Guadiana, and Guadalquivir, flowing W. and S. (some of them through Portugal) to the Atlantic Ocean. The N. slope has only the Nalón, the Bidassoa, and some mountain-streams. The chief tributaries are the Esla and the Pisuerga, which join the Douro; the Manzanares, which passes Madrid and joins the Jarama, an affluent of the Tagus; the Aragón, Gallego, and Segre, affluents of the Ebro; and the Genil, an affluent of the Guadalquivir. Few of these tributaries are navigable and those generally only for small boats near their mouths. The Guadalquivir is navigable from the sea to Seville. The only lakes or lagoons of Spain are Albufera, in Valencia, the Mar Menor, in Murcia, and the Laguna de la Janda, NW. of Gibraltar.

Climate.—The climate of Spain is one marked by extremes of temperature and on the whole by a deficiency of rainfall. The sheltered Mediterranean littoral between Gibraltar and Cape Nao has sub-tropical conditions prevailing and the warmest winter climate of Europe, with snow and frost at only rare intervals (average January temperature, 50°–55°). Here are the favored gardens and plantations (huertas) of Malaga, Motril, and Almería, and farther north the palm-groves of Elche, where alone in Europe the date grows freely and bears fruit. In this region the summer heat not infrequently rises to 105° and 110°; and even at Seville, beyond this tract, but still S. of the plateaus, the mercury has been known to rise to 115° in the shade. The climate of the major part of the great interior plateau is characterized by dryness, frequent winds, low winter-temperatures, and high summer-temperatures. At Madrid, which has perhaps the worst climate of any large European city, the winter cold is sufficient to freeze the streams and standing waters, while the summer heat not rarely exceeds 100°. Over the greater part of the peninsula there is a deficiency of rainfall, rendering irrigation a necessary condition of agricultural development, and giving much of the region a steppe-like character. Heavy rainstorms may, however, occur in almost all parts of the peninsula. The average annual rainfall on the table-land of Castile is only 10 inches, and the capital is often exposed to severe drought. Winter is the rainy season. The most noxious winds are the solano (the sirocco of Italy), a hot wind from the S., and the gallego, a cold NW. wind from the mountains of Galicia.

Vegetation, Agriculture, etc.—The flora of Spain is preeminently of the central European type, but much of it bears a steppe character. Except in the Pyrenees, in the Cantabrian Mountains, in the Sierra Nevada, and in parts of Estremadura, hardly any forest remains. In the sheltered Mediterranean littoral already referred to, the cane, vine, and many tropical and sub-tropical fruits (date, orange, banana, fig, citron, almond) are successfully cultivated, but in much of the less favored regions the esparto grass, from which paper is manufactured, is the dominant cultivated product. The olive is a largely representative type of the vegetation of the south, as is likewise the mulberry. The cork-oak remains as one of the types of the mountain flora. The principal agricultural crops are wheat and barley. Rye, oats, maize, and rice are also extensively cultivated, and considerable quantities of hemp and flax are produced. Spain is one of the great wine-producing countries of the world. The principal growths are those of Jerez (sherry), Rota, Malaga, Alicante, Malvasia, and Val de Peñas. Considerable silk is produced in Valencia and Murcia.

Animal Life.—The faunal elements of Spain are essentially those of the major part of Europe, with the infusion of a number of types which are almost wholly Mediterranean (or even north African) in character. The bear, wolf, wild-cat, lynx, fox, and some other carnivores are still among the denizens of the forested or wilder mountain tracts. The chamois and ibex are both found in the Pyrenees. Among domesticated animals, the horses of Andalusia are celebrated, and the mules and asses are remarkable for beauty and size. The cattle are of good breeds, and much attention is given in Andalusia and Estremadura to the breeding of bulls for the bull-ring. Goats are plentiful on the table-lands. Sheep-farming, although no longer so profitable an industry as formerly, is still important, and much attention is given to the perpetuation of the merino breed.

Minerals.—The mineral wealth of Spain is large and comprises extensive deposits of iron, copper, lead, zinc, cobalt, silver, quicksilver, sulphur, phosphorus, coal, and salt. The vast copper deposits of the Rio Tinto and the mercury of Almadén have long been famous. The amount of ore extracted from the different mines in 1903 was as follows: iron, 8,304,153 tons; copper, 2,799,789 tons; lead and silver-lead, 387,000 tons; zinc, 154,000 tons; and quicksilver, 30,370 tons. The output of coal was 2,587,652 tons (from the region of Oviedo and elsewhere) and of salt 427,000 tons. Mineral waters are abundant. The total number of hands employed in the mines in 1903 was 94,351.

Manufactures, etc.—Considering its size and population, Spain occupies a very inferior position as a manufacturing country. Outside of its extensively developed metallurgical industries, its manufactures comprise textiles, paper, leather and leather goods, iron- and steel-wares, tobacco, glass, soap, chemicals, sugar, esparto fabrics, etc. Barcelona has become a great manufacturing centre, its textile industry being on a large scale. The tobacco manufacture is a government monopoly. There are few good public roads in Spain, except those around Madrid. Much of the transport is effected by means of mules. There were in 1901 8380 miles of railway and 20,170 miles of telegraph lines in operation, traversing the country in all directions. From the extent of its coast-line, its numerous ports, its geographical position, and its natural products, Spain possesses commercial advantages that are shared by but few countries of Europe.

Government, Religion, Education, etc.—According to the constitution proclaimed in 1876 Spain is a constitutional monarchy. The legislative body is known as the Cortes. It consists of a senate and a congress. There are three classes of senators: Senators in their own right (senadores de derecho propio), life senators, appointed by the crown, and senators elected for a term of 10 years by the provincial representative bodies, largest tax-payers, higher institutions of learning, etc. The senators in their own right comprise royal princes, the wealthiest grandees, high military and naval officers, archbishops, and the heads of various high administrative and judicial bodies. The number of senators in this group and life senators combined is not to exceed that of the elected senators. Members of congress are elected by universal suffrage for a term of 5 years.

Voters must be 25 years of age. The capital of Spain is Madrid. Each province has its own legislature, and each minor division, or ayuntamiento (commune), its own municipal administration. The state religion is the Roman Catholic, with toleration for all sects. There are only a few thousand Protestants and a handful of Jews. The archbishop of Toledo bears the title of Primate of Spain. The convents were suppressed shortly before the middle of the nineteenth century and their property confiscated by the nation. Education is in a very backward state among the mass of the people, more than one-half of the population being unable to read. There are 10 universities, those of Barcelona, Granada, Madrid, Oviedo, Salamanca, Santiago, Saragossa, Seville, Valencia, and Valladolid. Some of these institutions have not all the faculties. That of Madrid has about 5000 students. The national library at Madrid is one of the largest collections of books in the world. The standing army consisted in 1904 of about 93,000 men, exclusive of the Civil Guard (about 20,000) and Carbineers (about 14,500). The war with the United States in 1898 reduced the naval power of Spain to small proportions.

Population.—The following table shows the old divisions of Spain and the modern provinces formed from them, with the population as returned in the census of 1900:

The following cities had a population exceeding 100,000 in 1900: Madrid (539,585), Barcelona, Valencia, Seville, Malaga, and Murcia. The largest non-Spanish element in the population is constituted by the Basques, who number about 400,000. There are many gypsies.

Colonies.—A hundred years ago the colonial possessions of Spain far exceeded in extent those of any other power. In 1800 (in which year Louisiana was retroceded to France) they embraced: All of South America exclusive of Brazil and Guiana; all of North America S. of the British possessions and W. of the Mississippi (Mexico, New Mexico, California, Louisiana), together with Florida; Central America; Cuba, Porto Rico, and other West India islands; the Philippine Islands; the Mariana Islands (Ladrones); and some possessions on the coast of Africa. Of this vast empire but little remained at the close of the first quarter of the nineteenth century outside of the Philippines and the West India islands, and the war of 1898 with the United States practically terminated the existence of Spain as a colonial power. The colonial possessions at the present day are the following, in Africa: Rio de Oro, stretching along the Saharan coast SSW. from Cape Bojador; Rio Muni, on the Gulf of Guinea; and the islands of Fernando Po, Annobon, Corisco, and Great and Little Elobey.

History.—The Iberian (Spanish-Portuguese) Peninsula took its name from the Iberians, who inhabited the country before the dawn of history. There was an influx of Celts from the N., and from the union of the two races sprang the Celtiberians. In some parts the Celts retained their nationality. In remote antiquity the Phœnicians had trading-posts on the coasts, which later were visited by the Greeks. About 236–220 B.C. the Carthaginians conquered the southern and southeastern parts of the peninsula, but they had barely succeeded in establishing themselves when they were driven out by the Romans. It was not until 19 B.C. that Rome became mistress of the entire peninsula by the subjugation of the Cantabri. Under the Romans the whole peninsula was known as Hispania. The Emperor Augustus divided the country into three provinces: Hispania Tarraconensis, in the N. and E.; Hispania Bætica, in the S.; and Lusitania, in the W., corresponding in great part to Portugal. Later the NW. corner was set off as the province of Gallæcia. At the beginning of the fifth century the Vandals, Suevi, and Alani poured into Spain from Gaul. They were soon followed by the Visigoths, who established a kingdom on both sides of the Pyrenees, subduing the Alani. The Vandals passed over into Africa. Towards the close of the sixth century the Visigoths (whose power in Gaul had been destroyed by the Franks) put an end to the realm of the Suevi. The whole of the Spanish peninsula was now a single Christian kingdom.

In 711 the Saracens (Arabs), having completed the conquest of northern Africa, invaded Spain and put an end to the kingdom of the Visigoths. Within a few years almost the entire peninsula was in their power, a little remnant of the Christian inhabitants continuing to struggle for independence in the mountain fastnesses of the NW. Having conquered Spain, the Saracens extended their dominion beyond the Pyrenees, but here their advance was soon arrested by the Franks. The Arabs of Spain soon cut loose from the Caliphate and Spain became an independent Mohammedan realm (756). This state, the emirate or kingdom (afterwards caliphate) of Cordova, ruled by the Ommiad dynasty, rivalled in splendor the great realm ruled by the caliphs of Bagdad. The Jews participated in this blossoming of Semitic civilization in the extreme W. The dominion of the Arabs had not been long established before the Christian power began to reassert itself vigorously in the NW. corner of the peninsula. In the course of the eighth century the little kingdom of Asturias struggled into existence. Little by little the Arabs were pressed back. At the close of the eighth century the Franks conquered the NE. corner of Spain (the Spanish Mark, later Catalonia). A little later the kingdom of Navarre arose. From the early part of the tenth century the Asturian realm figures as the kingdom of León. Early in the eleventh century the kingdoms of Castile and Aragon took their places on the map of Europe. At this time the Ommiad caliphate of Cordova fell to pieces and was succeeded by independent Mohammedan kingdoms, which were soon engulfed in the tide of Moorish conquest that swept over from Morocco. In 1085 the arms of León and Castile, now united, added the territory of the kingdom of Toledo (New Castile) to the Christian dominions. A few years later Portugal was erected into a county, to become ere long an independent kingdom. Catalonia shook off the French rule and in 1151 was united with Aragon. In the first half of the thirteenth century the Christian monarchs made tremendous inroads into the Mohammedan dominions, which were soon confined to the extreme southern part of the peninsula, the kingdom of Granada. This state, which for a time was very flourishing, succumbed to the arms of Aragon and Castile, which had been united under Ferdinand and Isabella (1479). The Christian sovereigns made their entry into the city of Granada at the beginning of 1492. The same year witnessed the discovery of America by Columbus. The first act of Ferdinand and Isabella after putting an end to the Moorish dominion was the expulsion of the Jews from Spain, to the great detriment of the country. In 1512 Ferdinand conquered all of Navarre S. of the Pyrenees (the bulk of the kingdom), so that all Spain was united under his rule. The dominions of Ferdinand included Sardinia, Naples, and Sicily.

On the accession to the throne in 1516 of Charles of Hapsburg, grandson of Ferdinand and Isabella and of the Emperor Maximilian and Mary of Burgundy, the Netherlands, then the most opulent country in Europe, were united with Spain, whose power at this time overshadowed that of every state in Christendom. The reign of Charles I. (who was elected to the imperial throne of Germany in 1519 as Charles V.) witnessed the conquest of Mexico, Peru, and other parts of America. Most of Lombardy (duchy of Milan) was at this time united with Spain. Under Philip II., the successor of Charles, the Spaniards undertook the conquest of the Philippine Islands. The religious persecutions of Philip II. drove the Netherlands to rebellion and the Dutch provinces were lost. From the time of the destruction of the Grand Armada, in 1588, the power of Spain declined steadily. The Hapsburg dynasty came to an end in 1700 and was succeeded by the House of Bourbon. At the close of the War of the Spanish Succession (1701–14) the dominions of Spain in Europe were reduced to their present dimensions; Gibraltar was in the hands of the English. The Spanish realm in the New World reached its greatest extension in 1763 with the acquisition of Louisiana (retroceded to France in 1800). Between 1810 and 1826 the Spanish colonies in America (except the islands) emancipated themselves from the mother-country. In the war with the United States in 1898 Spain lost Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Philippines and her existence as a colonial power came practically to an end.

Spain, a post-village of Marshall co., S.Dak., on the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul R. The banking point is Britton or Langford. It has grain-elevators.

Spalato, spä'lä-to, or Spalatro (Slavic, Split), a seaport of Austria-Hungary, in Dalmatia, on a peninsula projecting into the Adriatic, 74 miles SE. of Zara. The old portion is practically comprised within the area of the famous palace in which the Roman Emperor Diocletian lived after his abdication. The newer quarters are well laid out and modern in appearance. The cathedral, originally a temple or a mausoleum, has an interesting loggia and a fine campanile. Spitzbergen, spits'bẹrg'ẹn, a group of islands in the Arctic Ocean, between Franz-Josef Land and Greenland, and on the western edge of the Barents Sea. They lie between about lat. 76° and 80° 48′ (Seven Islands) N. lat., and are crossed centrally by the meridian of 20° E. lon. The principal islands are West Spitzbergen, the largest, Northeast Land (separated from the last by Hinlopen Strait), Edge Island, King-Charles (or Wiche) Land (in the E.), King-Charles Foreland, and Hope Island (in the SE.). The minor Danes Islands are off the NW. coast of West Spitzbergen. Spitzbergen is a mountainous region, with general elevations rising to 2000–4000 feet, and with deep fjords extending far into the coast-line (Ice Fjord, on the W. coast, 50 miles in length). The highest elevation, found immediately S. of Treurenberg Bay, is 5580 ft., surpassing by nearly 1200 ft. the Hornsundstind, near South Cape, which was for a long time considered to be the culminating point. Snow and ice cover most of the mountain-summits, but not to the extent of obscuring the underlying orographic features. Glaciers have ordinarily only a local development, but on Northeast Land there is a true (even if minor) ice-cap rising to upward of 2000 ft. The climate is cold, although not excessively so, and recent observations would seem to indicate a higher winter temperature than is found in St. Petersburg (mean temperature for December, 23°; lowest temperature, in March, —26°). The vegetation is confined chiefly to plants of rapid growth, which do not ordinarily rise above 4 or 6 inches, and for the most part spring up, flower, and seed, in a month or six weeks. During winter, which sets in at the end of September, the sun remains for four months below the horizon, but the darkness of night-time is relieved for about six hours by a faint twilight. The larger forms of animal life are foxes, bears, and reindeer; in pursuit of which, as well as of walruses and seals, the islands are regularly visited by hunters. Sea-fowl are numerous. The minerals are known to include marble and coal. Many interesting plant-remains, chiefly of Tertiary age, have been found in the islands. Spitzbergen was discovered in 1596 by the Dutch navigator Barents, in endeavoring to effect a NE. passage to India. They are not permanently inhabited and are not claimed by any nation.
